

THE GOLDEN HELM

This ebook is for the use of anyone anywhere in the United States and most other parts of the world at no cost and with almost no restrictions whatsoever. You may copy it, give it away or re-use it under the terms of the Project Gutenberg License included with this ebook or online at <https://www.gutenberg.org/license>. If you are not located in the United States, you'll have to check the laws of the country where you are located before using this ebook.

Title: The Golden Helm
and Other Verse

Author: Wilfrid Wilson Gibson

Release Date: February 08, 2013 [eBook #42052]

Language: English

*** START OF THIS PROJECT GUTENBERG EBOOK THE GOLDEN HELM ***

Produced by Al Haines.

[image]

Cover

THE

GOLDEN HELM AND OTHER VERSE

BY WILFRID WILSON GIBSON

LONDON
ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET
1903

TO HOWARD PEASE

BY THE SAME WRITER

URLYN THE HARPER AND OTHER SONG
THE QUEEN'S VIGIL AND OTHER SONG

Thanks are due to Messrs. Smith, Elder, & Co., for permission to reprint "The King's Death," "The Three Kings," and the first part of "Averlaine and Arkeld," from The Cornhill Magazine; to the editor of Macmillan's Magazine for leave to reprint "In the Valley"; to the editor of The Saturday Review for leave to reprint "Notre Dame de la Belle-Verrière"; and to the editors of The Pilot, The Outlook, The Pall Mall Gazette, Country Life, The Week's Survey, and The Broadsheet, for like courtesy with regard to a number of "The Songs of Queen Averlaine."

Contents

The Torch
 The Unknown Knight
 The King's Death
 The Knight of the Wood
 Notre Dame de la Belle-Verrière
 In the Valley
 The Vision: a Christmas Mystery
 The Three Kings
 The Songs of Queen Averlaine
 The Golden Helm

The Torch

Through skies blown clear by storm, o'er storm-spent seas,
 Day kindled pale with promise of full noon
 Of blue unclouded; no night-weary wind
 Ruffled the slumberous, heaving deeps to white,
 Though round the Farne Isles the waves never sink
 In foamless sleep—about the pillared crags
 For ever circling with unresting spray.
 At dawn's first glimmer, from his island-cell—
 Rock-hewn, secure from tempest—Oswald came
 With slow and weary step, white-faced and worn
 With night-long vigil for storm-perilled souls.
 His anxious eye with sharp foreboding bright—
 He scanned the treacherous flood; the long froth-trail
 That marks the lurking reefs; the jag-toothed chasms
 Which, foaming, gape at night beneath the keel—
 The mouth of hell to storm-bewildered ships:
 But no scar-stranded vessel met his glance.
 Relieved, he drank the glistening calm of morn,
 With nostril keen and warm lips parted wide;
 While, gradually, the sun-enkindled air

Quickened his pallid cheek with youthful flame,
 Though lonely years had silvered his dark head,
 And round his eyes had woven shadow-meshes.
 Clearly he caught the ever-clamorous cries
 Of guillemot and puffin from afar,
 Where, canopied by hovering, white wings,
 They crowded naked pinnacles of rock.
 He watched, with eyes of glistening tenderness,
 The brooding eider—Cuthbert's sacred bird,
 That bears among the isles his saintly name—
 Breast the calm waves; a black, wet-gleaming fin
 Cleft the blue waters with a foaming jag,
 Where, close behind the restless herring-herd,
 With ravening maw of death, the porpoise sped.
 Oswald, light-tranced, dreamed in the sun awhile;
 Till, suddenly, as some old sorrow starts,
 Though years have glided by with soothing lull,
 The gust of ancient longing rent his bliss:
 His narrow isle, as by some darkling spell,
 More narrow shrank; the gulls' unceasing cries
 Grew still more fretful; and his hermit-life
 A sea-scourged desolation to him seemed.
 The holy tree of peace—which he had dreamt
 Would flourish in the wilderness afresh,
 Upspringing ever in new ecstasy
 Of branching beauty and white blooms of truth,
 Till its star-tangling crest should cleave the sky,
 And angels rustle through its topmost boughs—
 Seemed sapless, rootless. Through his quivering limbs
 His famine-wasted youth to life upheapt
 With passionate yearning for humanity:
 The stir of towns; the jostling of glad throngs;
 Welcoming faces and warm-clasping hands;
 Yea, even for the lips and eyes of Love
 He hungered with keen pangs of old desire:
 And, if for him these might not be, he craved
 At least the exultation of swift peril—
 The red-foamed riot of delirious strife
 That rears a bloody crest o'er peaceful shires,
 And, slaying, in a swirl of slaughter dies.

With brow uplifted and strained, pulsing throat,
And salt-parched lips out-thrust, unto the sun
He stretched beseeching hands, as though he sought
To snatch some glittering disaster thence.
One moment radiant thus; and then once more
His arms dropped listless, and he slowly shrank
Within his sea-stained habit, cowering dark
Amid the azure blaze of sea and sky.
Then, stirring, with impatient step he moved
Across the isle to where the rocky shore,
Forming a little, crag-encircled bay,
Sloped steeply to the level of the sea;
But, as he neared the edges of the tide,
Startled, he paused, as, marvelling, he saw
A woman on the shelving, wet, black rock,
Lying, forlorn, among the storm-wrack, white
And motionless; still wet, her raiment clung
About her limbs, and with her wet, gold hair
Green sea-weed tangled. Oswald on her looked Amazed, as one who, in a sea-born trance,
Discovers the lone spirit of the storm,
Self-spent at last, and sunk in dreamless slumber
Within some caverned gloom. Coldly he watched
The little waves creep up the glistening rock,
And, faltering, slide once more into the deep,
As though they feared to waken her: at length,
When one, more venturous, about her stole,
And moved her heavy hair as if with life,
He shuddered; and a lightning-knowledge struck
His heart with fear; and in a flash he knew
That no sea-phantom couched before him lay,
But some frail fellow-creature, tempest-tost,
Hung yet in peril on the edge of death,
Her weak life slipping from the saving grasp
While he delayed. He sprang through plashy weed,
O'er slippery ridges, to the rock whereon
She lay with upturned face and close-shut eyes—
One hand across her breast, the other dipped
Within a shallow pool of emerald water,
With blue-veined fingers clutching the red fronds

Of frail sea-weed. Then Oswald, bending, felt
Upon his cheek the feeble breath that still
Fluttered between the pallid, parted lips.
In trembling haste, he loosed the sodden cords
That bound her to a spar; and with hot hands
He chafed her icy limbs, until the glow
Of life returned. With fitful quivering
The white lids opened; and she looked on him
With dull, unwondering eyes whose deep-sea blue
The gloom of death's late passing shadowed yet;
When suddenly light thrilled them, and bright fear
Flashed from their depths, and, with a little gasp,
She strove to rise; but Oswald with quick words
Calmed her weak terror, and she sank once more,
Closing her eyes; and, gently lifting her
Within his arms—her gold hair hanging straight
And heavy with sea-water, as he plunged
Knee-deep through pools of crackling bladder-weed—
He bore her, unresisting, o'er the isle
Unto the rock-built shelter he had reared,
Some little way apart from his own cell,
For storm-stayed fishers or wrecked mariners.
He laid her on a bed of withered bents,
And ministered to her with gentle hands
And ceaseless care; till, wrapped in warm, deep sleep,
She sank oblivious. Silently he placed
His island-fare beside her on the board,
Lest she should wake in need; then, with hushed step,
He turned to go; but, ere he reached the door,
He paused, and looked again towards the bed,
As though he feared his strange sea-guest might flee
Like some wild spirit, born of wondering foam,
That wins from man the shelter of his breast,
Then, on a night of moon-enchanted tides,
Leaps with shrill laughter to its native seas,
Bearing his soul within its glistening arms,
To drown his peace on earth and hope of heaven
In cold eternities of lightless deeps.
But still in dreamless sleep the stranger lay,
With parted lips and breathing soft and calm;

About her head unloosed, her hair outshone,
 Among the grey-green bents, like fine, red gold.
 So beautiful she was that Oswald, pierced
 With quivering rapture, dared no longer bide,
 But, with quick fingers, softly raised the latch,
 And stumbled o'er the threshold. As he went,
 A flock of sea-gulls from the bent-thatched roof
 Rose, querulous, and round him, wheeling, swept,
 With creaking wings and cold, black eyes agleam;
 Yet Oswald saw them not, nor heard their cries;
 Nor saw he, as he paced the eastern crags,
 How, round the Farnes, the dreaming ocean lay
 In broad, unshadowed, sapphire ecstasy,
 That glowed to noon through slow, uncounted hours.
 His early gloom had vanished; time and space
 And earth and sea no longer compassed him;
 One thought alone consumed him—beauty slept
 Within the shelter of his hermitage,
 Upon grey, rustling bents, with golden hair.
 He roamed, unresting, till the copper sun
 Sank in a steel-grey sea, and earth and sky
 Were strewn with shadows—wavering and dim—
 To weave a pathway for the dawning moon,
 That she, from night's oblivion, might create
 With the cold spell of her enchantments old
 A phantom earth with magical, bright seas,
 A vaster heaven of unrevealed stars.
 Unmoving, on a headland of swart crag
 That jutted gaunt and sharp against the night,
 Stood Oswald, cowed and silent. Hour by hour
 He gazed across the sea, which nothing shadowed,
 Save where—now dim, now white—a lonely sail
 Hung, restless, o'er a fisher's barren toil.
 Yet Oswald saw nor sail nor moon nor sea:
 His heart kept vigil by the little house
 Wherein the stranger slumbered; and it seemed
 His life, by some strange power within him stayed,
 Awaited the unlatching of the door.

But now, within the hut, the sleeper dreamt

Of foaming caverns and o'erwhelming waters;
Then, shuddering awake, awhile she lay,
And watched the moonlight, cold and white, which poured
Through the warm dusk, from the high window-slit;
When, all at once, the strangeness of the room
Closed in upon her with bewildering dread.
She stirred; the bents, beneath her, rustled strange;
She started in affright, and, swaying, stood
Within the streaming moonlight, till, at last,
In memory, once more disaster swept
Over her life, and left her, desolate,
Upon bleak crags of alien seas unknown.
Yet, through the tumult of tempestuous dark,
Above the echo of despairing cries,
A calm voice sounded; and beyond the whirl
Of foaming death, wherein she caught the gleam
Of well-loved faces drowning in cold seas,
A living face shone out—a beacon clear:
Then numbing fear fell from her, and she moved,
Unlatched the door, and stole into the night.
One moment, dazzled by the full-moon glare,
She paused, a shivering form within the wide
And glittering desolation—lone and frail.
But Oswald, watchful on the eastern scars,
Seeing her, forward came with eager pace
To meet her; and, as he drew swiftly near,
His cowl fell backward; and she knew again
The face that calmed the terrors of her dreams.
Yet, with the knowledge, through her being stole,
Vague fear more strange, more impotent than the blind
Unquestioning dread when death had round her stormed;
No peril of the body could arouse
Such ecstasy of terror in her soul,
Which seemed upborne upon the shivering crest
Of some great wave, just curving, ere it crash
Upon the crags of time. Yet, though she feared
When Oswald paused, uncertain, quick she spake,
As though she sought to parry doom with words.
She questioned him—scarce heeding his replies—
How she had hither come; when, suddenly,

Sped by her fluttering words, the last, dim cloud
 Rolled from her memory, and she saw revealed
 Within a pitiless glare of naked light
 The utmost horror of her desolation.
 Mute with despair, she stood with parted lips,
 And then cried fiercely: "Hath the sea upcast
 None other on this shore? Am I, alone,
 Of all my kin who sailed in that doomed ship,
 Flung back to life?" And as, with piteous glance,
 He answered her: "Ah God, that I, with them,
 Had died! O traitor cords that held too sure
 My body to the broken spar of life!
 O feeble seas, that fumed in such wild wrath,
 Yet could not quench so frail a thing as I!"
 With passionate step, across the isle she ran,
 And leapt from crag to crag, until she stood
 Upon a dizzy scar that jutted sheer
 Above low-lapping waves. Then once again
 Her moaning cry was heard among the Isles:
 "O bitter waters, give them back to me!
 You shall not keep them; all your waves of woe
 Cannot withhold from me those dauntless lives
 That were my life. Surely they cannot rest
 Without me; even from your unfathomed graves
 Surely my love will draw them to my arms!"
 As though in tremulous expectation tranced,
 She yearned, with arms outstretched; as dawn arose
 Exultant from the sea, and with clear rays
 Kindled her wind-tost hair to streaming flame.

Awhile she stood, then, moaning, slowly sank
 Upon the crag; and Oswald came to her
 With words of comfort which unloosed her pent
 And aching woe in swift, tumultuous tears.
 Oswald, in silent anguish, drew apart,
 Gazing, unseeing, o'er the dawning waves;
 Until at last the tempest of her grief,
 In low and fitful sobbing, spent itself;
 When, turning to him, once again she spake,
 And, shuddering, with faltering voice, outpoured

The tale of her despair: and Oswald heard
How she, who sat thus strangely by his side,
Marna, a sea-earl's daughter, had besought
Her father, when the old sea-hunger lit
His eyes—as waves shot through with stormy fight—
For leave to bear him company but once,
When, with his sons, he rode the adventurous seas;
How he had yielded with reluctant love;
And how, from out the firth of some far strand,
Their galley rode, beneath a flaming dawn;
How her young heart had leapt to see the sails
Unfurled to take the wind, as, one by one,
Toil-glistening rowers shipped the dripping oars,
And loosened every sheet before the breeze;
How, as the ship with timbers all astrain,
Leapt to mid-sea, through Marna's body thrilled
A kindred rapture, and there came to her
The sheer, delirious joy of them true-born
To wander with the foam—each creaking cord
That tugged the quivering mast unto her singing
Of unknown shores and far, enchanted lands,
Beyond the blue horizon; how, all day,
They rode, undaunted, through the spinning surf;
But, as the sun dipped, in the cold, grey tide,
The wind, that since the dawn with steady speed
Had filled the sails, now came in fitful gusts,
Fierce and yet fiercer, till the sullen waves
Were lashed to anger, and the waters leapt
To tussle with the furies of the air;
And how the ship, in the encounter caught,
Was tossed on crests of swirling dark, or dropped
Between o'er-toppling walls of whelming night;
How in those hours—too dread for thought or speech—
Her father's hand had bound her to a spar;
And, even as—the cord between his teeth—
He tugged the last knot sure, the vessel crashed
Upon a cleaving scar; and she but saw
The strong, pale faces looking upon death,
Before the fierce, exultant waters closed
With cold oblivion o'er them; and no more

She knew, until she waked within the hut,
 To find her world, in one disastrous night,
 In one swift surge of roaring darkness, swept
 From her young feet; her kindred, home and friends,
 And all familiar hopes and joys and fears
 Dropt like a garment from her life, which now
 Stood naked on the edge of some new world
 Of unknown terrors.

Oswald heard her tale

With pitying glance; yet in his eyes arose
 A strange, new light, which as each gust of grief
 Shook out the fluttering words, more brightly burned;
 So that, when Marna ceased, it seemed to her
 That he, in holy contemplation rapt,
 Had heeded not her woe; and from her heart
 Burst out a cry: "Ah God, I am alone!"
 But, stung by her shrill anguish, Oswald waked
 From his bright reverie, and his shining eyes
 Darkened with swift compassion, as he turned
 And, trembling, spake: "Nay, not alone..."

Then mute

He stood—his pale lips clenched—as though within
 There surged a torrent which he dared not loose.
 Marna looked wondering up; but, when her eyes
 Saw the white passion of his face, her soul
 Was tossed once more on crests of unknown fears;
 Yet rapture warred with terror in her heart;
 She trembled, and her breath came short and quick.
 She dared not raise her eyes again to his,
 Till, on her straining ears, his words, once more,
 Fell, slow and cold and clear as water dripping
 Between locked sluice-gates: "Nothing need you fear.
 Beyond the sea of unknown terrors lie
 White havens of an undiscovered peace.
 For even this bleak, scar-embattled coast
 May yield safe harbour to the storm-spent soul.
 Your world has fallen from you that you may
 Enter another world, more beautiful,
 Built 'neath the shadow of the throne of God.
 There shall you find new friends, who yet will seem

Familiar to your eyes, because their souls
 Have passed through kindred perils and despairs."
 He ceased; and silence, trembling, 'twixt them hung;
 Till Marna, gazing yet across the sea,
 Rent it with words: "Where may I find this peace?"
 And Oswald answered: "In an inland dale
 The Sisters of the Cross await your coming,
 With ever-open gate. Within seven days,
 My brethren from the mainland will put out,
 Bringing me food; on their return with them
 You may embark. Till then, this barren rock
 Must be your home." Exultant light once more
 Leapt, flashing, in the depths of his dark eyes.
 Yet Marna looked not up, but, slowly, spake:
 "Yea, I must go.... But you...."

Then in dismay

She stopped, as though the thought had slipped unknown
 From her full heart; but Oswald caught the words,
 And spake with hard, quick speech, as if to baffle
 Some doubt that strove within him: "On this Isle
 I bide, till God shall kindle my weak soul
 To burn, a beacon o'er His lonely seas."
 Once more he paused; and perilous silence swayed
 Between them, until Oswald, quaking, rose,
 As one who dared no longer rest beneath
 O'er-toppling doom. Yet, with calm voice, he spake:
 "Even within this wilderness abides
 Such beauty that, in your brief sojourn here,
 Your soul shall starve not; all about you sweeps
 The ever-changing wonder of the sea;
 But if, too full of bitter memories,
 The bright waves darken, you may lift your eyes
 To watch the swooping gull; the flashing tern;
 The stately cormorant and the kittiwake—
 Most beautiful of all the island-birds;
 Or, if your woman's heart should crave some grace
 More exquisite, see, frail bell-campions blow,
 As foam-flowers on the shallow, sandy turf."
 As thus he spake, a light in Marna's eyes
 Arose, and sorrow left her for awhile:

And she with bright glance questioned him, and watched
 The hovering gulls, and plucked the snowy blooms,
 With little cries at each discovered beauty.
 Yet Oswald by her side walked silently,
 And watched, as one struck mute with anguished fear,
 Her eager eyes, and heard her chattering words.
 Then, suddenly, he left her, but returned
 Within the hour, with faltering step, and spake
 With tremulous voice: "We two must part awhile;
 For I must keep lone vigil in my cell
 Six days and nights, with fasting and with prayer;
 Meanwhile, within the little hut for you
 Are food and shelter till the brethren come.
 When I must give you over to their care."
 Marna, with wondering heart, looked up at him;
 But such a wild light flickered in his eyes
 She dared not speak; and, shuddering, he turned,
 And strode back swiftly to the hermitage.

Marna looked after him with yearning gaze,
 As though her heart would have her call him back,
 Yet her lips moved not; motionless, she watched
 Until he passed from sight; then, sinking low
 Among the flowers, she wept, she knew not why.

And, as the door closed on him, Oswald fell
 Prone on the cold, black, vigil-furrowed rock
 That paved his narrow cell; and long he lay
 As in the clutch of some dread waking-trance,
 Nor stirred until the shadows into night
 Were woven. Then unto his feet he leapt
 With this wild cry: "O God, why hast Thou sent
 This scourge most bitter for my naked soul?
 I feared not storm nor solitude, O God;
 I shrank not from the tempest of Thy wrath;
 Though oft my weak soul wavered, trampled o'er
 By deedless hours, and yearned unto the world,
 Ever afresh Thy love hath bound me fast
 Unto this island of Thy lonely seas;
 And I, who deemed that I at last might reach—

I who had come through all—Thy golden haven,
 Knew not Thy hand withheld this last despair,
 This scourge most bitter, being most beautiful.”
 Then on his knees he sank, and tried to pray
 Before the Virgin’s shrine, where ever burned
 His votive taper with unfailing light.
 But when his lips would breathe the holy name,
 His heart cried: ”Marna! Marna!” Every pulse
 Throbbled ”Marna!” And his body shook and swayed,
 As though it strove to utter that one word,
 And cry it once unto eternal stars,
 Though it should perish crying. Through the cell
 The silence murmured: ”Marna!” And without
 A lone gull wailed it to the windy night.
 He lifted his wild eyes, and in the shrine
 He saw the face of Marna, which outburned
 The flickering taper; on the gloom up-surged,
 Foam-white, the face of Marna; till the dark
 Flowed pitiful o’er him, and on the stone
 He sank unconscious. Night went slowly by,
 And pale dawn stole in silence through his cell;
 And, in the light of morn, the taper died,
 With feeble guttering; yet he never stirred,
 Though noonday waxed and waned.

But Marna roamed

All night beneath the stars. To her it seemed
 That not until the closing of the door
 Had all hope perished: now death tore, afresh,
 Her father and her brothers from her arms.
 By day and night and under sun and moon
 She roamed unresting—seeing, heeding naught—
 Till weariness o’ercame her, and she slept;
 And, as she slumbered, snowy-plumed peace
 Nestled within her heart; and, when she waked,
 She only yearned for that dim, cloistral calm,
 Embosomed deep in some bough-sheltered vale,
 Whither the boat must bear her.

In his cell,

As night paled slowly to the seventh morn,
 Oswald arose—the fire within his eyes

Yet more intense, more fierce. With eager hand
 He clutched the latch, and, flinging wide the door,
 He strode into the dawn. One moment, dazed,
 As though bewildered by the light, he paused;
 But, when his glance in restless roving fell
 On Marna, standing on the western crag
 Against the setting moon, beneath the dawn,
 His passion surged upon him, and he shook;
 Then, springing madly forth, he, stumbling, ran,
 And, falling at her feet upon the rock,
 His voice rang out in fearful exultation:
 "You shall not go! I cannot let you go!
 Has not the tumult tossed you to my breast?
 Yea, and not all the storms of all the seas
 Shall drag you from me! Nay, you shall not go!
 For we will live together on this isle
 Which time has builded in the deeps for us—
 We two together, one in ecstasy,
 Throughout eternity; for time shall fall
 From off us; and the world shall be no more:
 And God, if God should stand between us now..."
 Faltering, he paused; and Marna stood, afraid,
 Quaking before him; but she spake no word.
 Across the waters came the splash of oars;
 But Oswald heard them not, and once more cried:
 "You will not go—thrusting me back to death?
 For now I know the strange, new thing you brought
 For me from out the storm was life—yea, life;
 And I am one arisen from the grave.
 You will not thrust me back and take again
 That which you came through storm to bring to me?
 You will not go? I cannot let you go!"

He ceased; and now the even splash of oars
 Came clearer. One dread moment Marna stood
 Swaying; then, stretching forth her arms, she cried:
 "Ah God! Ah God! Why hath Thy cold hand set
 This doom upon me? Must I ever bear
 Death and disaster unto whom I love?
 Oh, is it not enough that, 'neath the wave,

Because I sought to bear them company,
 My father and my brothers lie in death?
 But this—ah God—that it should come to this!
 Must I bear ever death within my hands?”

She paused one moment, with wild-heaving breast;
 Then, turning unto Oswald, spake again,
 With softer voice: "But you—have you no pity?
 You who are but God's servant—surely you
 Have pity on my weakness. From this doom
 Which overhangs me you must set me free.
 You say I brought you life; but in me lies
 For you—the priest of God—a death more deep
 Than all the drowning fathoms of the sea.
 I go, that you may live. If life indeed
 I brought you, I was but the torch of God
 To kindle the clear flame of your strong soul
 To burn, a beacon o'er His lonely seas."
 She ceased, with arms outstretched and lighted eyes.
 As on some holy vision Oswald gazed
 In rapt, adoring fear; nor spake, nor stirred.
 Near, and yet nearer, drew the plash of oars;
 And, turning in the boat, the brethren looked
 With wondering eyes upon them, whispering: "Lo,
 Some seraph-messenger of God most high
 Tarries with Oswald. See the strange new peace
 That burns his face like a white altar-flame.
 Not yet must we draw near, lest our weak sight
 Be blinded by that glory of gold hair
 That gleams so strangely in the light of dawn."

The Unknown Knight

When purple gloomed the wintry ridge
 Against the sunset's windy flame,

From pine-browed hills, along the bridge,
An unknown rider came.

I watched him idly from the tower.
Though he nor looked nor raised his head;
I felt my life before him cower
In dumb, foreboding dread.

I saw him to the portal win
Unchallenged, and no lackey stirred
To take his bridle when within
He strode without a word.

Through all the house he passed unstayed,
Until he reached my father's door;
The hinge shrieked out like one afraid;
Then silence fell once more.

All night I hear the chafing ice
Float, griding, down the swollen stream;
I lie fast-held in terror's vice,
Nor dare to think or dream.

I only know the unknown knight
Keeps vigil by my father's bed:
Oh, who shall wake to see the light
Flame all the east with red?

The King's Death

The sleeping-chamber of the King: a candle burns dimly by the curtained bed. The arras parts, and two slaves enter with daggers. A storm of wind rages without.

FIRST SLAVE: He sleeps.

SECOND SLAVE: He sleeps, whom only death shall rouse
To dread unsleeping in another world.

FIRST SLAVE: How long the careful night has kept him wakeful,
As if sleep loathed to snare him for our knives!

SECOND SLAVE: Yea, we have crouched so close in quaking dark
I scarce can lift my sword-arm: strike you first.

FIRST SLAVE: The heavy waiting hours have crushed my strength;
The hate that burst to such an eager flame
Within my heart has smouldered to dull ash,
Which pity breathes to scatter.

SECOND SLAVE: Knows he pity?

FIRST SLAVE: Nay, he is throned above his slaughtered kin,
A reeking sword his sceptre. He has broken,
As one across the knee a faggot snaps,
Strong lives to feed the blaze of his ambition;
Yet shall a slave's hand strike cold death in him
For whom kings sweat like slaves?

SECOND SLAVE: Yea, at the stroke
One slave lies dead—a hundred kings are born;
For every man that breathes will be a king;
Vast empires, beaten-dust beneath his feet,
Will rise again and teem with kingly men,
When he, their death, is dead

FIRST SLAVE: How still he sleeps!
The tempest shrieks to wake him, yet he slumbers.
As seas that foam against unyielding scars,
The mad wind storms the castle, wall and tower,
And is not spent. Hark, it has found a breach—
Some latch unloosed—the house is full of wind;
It rushes, wailing, down the corridor;
It seeks the King; it cries on him to waken;
Now 'tis without, and shakes the rattling bolt;
Lo, it has broken in, in little gusts,

I feel it in my hair; 'twill lay cold fingers
Upon his lips, and start him from his sleep.
See, it has whipt the yellow flame to smoke.

SECOND SLAVE: And now it fails; the heavy, hanging gold
That shelters him from night is all unstirred.

FIRST SLAVE: Even the wind must pause.

SECOND SLAVE: 'Twas but a breeze
To blow our sinking courage to clear fire.
Too long we loiter; soon the approaching day
Will take us, slaves who grasp the arms of men
Yet dare not plunge them save in our own breasts.
Come, let us strike!

(They approach the bed and draw aside the curtain.)

FIRST SLAVE: The King—how still he sleeps!
Can majesty in such calm slumber lie?

SECOND SLAVE: Come, falter not, strike home!

FIRST SLAVE: Hold, hold your hand,
For death has stolen a march upon our hate;
He does not breathe.

SECOND SLAVE: The stars have wrought for us,
And we are conquerors with unbloodied hands.

FIRST SLAVE: Nay, nay, for in our thoughts his life was spilt;
While yet our bodies lagged in fettered fear,
Our shafted breath sped on and stabbed his sleep.
Oh, red for all the world, across our brows,
Our murderous thoughts have burned the brand of Cain.

See, through the window stares the pitiless day!

The Knight of the Wood

"I fear the Knight of the Wood," she said
 "For him may no man overthrow.
 Where boughs are matted thick o'erhead,
 There gleams, amid the shadows dread,
 The terror of his armour red;
 And all men fear him, high and low;
 Yet all must through the forest go."

She paused awhile where larches flame
 About the borders of the wood;
 Then, crying loud on Love's high name
 To keep her maiden-heart from shame,
 She entered, and full-swiftly came
 Where, hooded with a scarlet hood,
 A rider in her pathway stood.

She saw the gleam of armour red;
 She saw the fiery pennon wave
 Its flaming terror overhead
 'Mid writhing boughs and shadows dread.
 "Ah God," she cried: "that I were dead,
 And laid for ever in my grave!"
 Then, swooning, called on Love to save.

Among the springing fern she fell,
 And very nigh to death she lay;
 Till, like the fading of a spell
 At ringing of the matin-bell,
 The darkness left her; by a well
 She waked beneath the open day,
 And rose to go upon her way;

When, once again, the ruddy light
 Of arms she saw, and turned to flee;
 But clutching brambles stayed her flight;
 While, marvelling, she saw the Knight
 Unhooded; and his eyes were bright
 With April colours of the sea;
 And crowned as a King was he.

She knelt before him in the ferns,
 And sang: "O Lord of Love, I bow
 Before thy shield, where blazoned burns
 The flaming heart with light that turns
 The night to day. O heart that yearns
 For love, lo, Love before thee now—
 The wild-wood knight with crownèd brow!"

Notre Dame de la Belle-Verrière

Above Thy halo's burning blue
 For ever hovers the White Dove;
 Thy heart enshrines, for ever new,
 The Cross—the Crown of all Thy love;
 While, sapphire wing on sapphire wing,
 About Thee choiring angels swing
 Gold censers, and bright candles bear.
 Because I have no heart to sing,
 I come to Thee with all my care,
Notre Dame de la Belle-Verrière.

Because the sword hath pierced Thy side,
 Thy brows are crowned with circling gold.
 The woe of all the world doth hide
 Within Thy mantle's azure fold.
 Because Thou, too, hast dwelt with fears,
 Through lingering days and endless years,

I find no comfort elsewhere,
 Our Lady beautiful with tears,
 Our Lady sorrowfully fair,
Notre Dame de la Belle-Verrière.

My feet have travelled the hot road
 Between the poppies' barren fires;
 But now I cast aside the load
 Of burning hopes and wild desires
 That ever fierce and fiercer grew.
 Thy peace falls like a falling dew
 Upon me as I kneel in prayer,
 Because Thou hast known sorrow, too,
 Because Thou, too, hast known despair,
Notre Dame de la Belle-Verrière.

In the Valley

Love, take my hand, and look not with sad eyes
 Through the valley-shades: for us, the mountains rise;
 Beneath the cold, blue-cleaving peaks of snow
 Like flame the April-blossomed almonds blow—
 Spring-grace and winter-glory intertwined
 Within the glittering web that colour weaves.

*Yet who are they who troop so close behind
 With raiment rustling like frost-withered leaves
 That burden winter-winds with ever-restless sighs?*

Love, look not back, nor ever hearken more
 To murmuring shades; for us, the river-shore
 Is lit with dew-hung daffodils that gleam
 On either side the tawny, foaming stream
 That bears through April with triumphal song
 Dissolving winter to the brimming sea.

*Yet who are they who, ever-whispering, throng,
With lean, grey lips that shudder piteously,
As if from some bright fruit of bitter-tasting core?*

Nay, look not back, for, lo, in tranced light
Love stays awhile his world-encircling flight
To wait our coming from the valley-ways;
See where, a hovering fire amid the blaze,
He pants aflame with irised plumes unfurled
Above the utmost pinnacle of noon.

*Yet who are they who wander through the world
Like weary clouds about a wintry moon,
With wan, bewildered brows that bear eternal night?*

Love, look not back, nor fill thy heart with woe
Of old, sad loves that perished long ago;
For ever after living lovers tread
Pale, yearning ghosts of all earth's lovers dead.
A little while with life we lead the train
Ere we, too, follow, cold, some breathing love.

*I fear their fevered eyes and hands that strain
To snatch our joy that flutters bright above,
To shadow with grey death its ruddy, pulsing glow.*

Love, look not back in this life-crowning hour
When all our love breaks into perfect flower
Beneath the kindling heights of frozen time.
Come, Love, that we with happy haste may climb
Beyond the valley, and may chance to see
Some unknown peak that cleaves unfading skies.

*Old sorrow saps my strength; I may not flee
The flame of passionate hunger in their eyes;
Beseeching shade on shade—they hold me in their power.*

Love, look not back, for, all too brief, our day,
In wilder glories flameth fast away.
Lo, even now, the northern snow-ridge glows—

With purple shadowed—from pale gold to rose
 That shivers white beneath stars dawning cold.
 Lift up thine eyes ere all the colour fades.

*Ah, rainbow-plumèd Love in airs of gold,
 Too late I turn, a shade among the shades.
 To follow, death-enthralled, thy flight through ages grey.*

The Vision.

A CHRISTMAS MYSTERY.

PERSONS: A YOUNG HERD. HIS MOTHER.

SCENE: THE QUEEN'S CRAGS.

TIME: CHRISTMAS EVE.

The herd stands at the foot of the Craggs, gazing across the dark fells. His mother enters.

MOTHER: Son, come home, nor tarry here
 In this peril-haunted place.
 My old heart is filled with fear
 By the white flame of thy face,
 And thine eyes whose restless fire
 Burneth ever wild and clear
 As red peats between the bars.
 Son, come home; the night is cold;
 Dropping from the wintry stars,
 Tingling frost falls through the air;
 See, the bents are white with rime;
 All the sheep are in the fold;
 All the cattle in the byre;
 Only we, of live things, roam
 O'er the fells so far from home;
 E'en the red fox in his lair

Snuggles close to keep him warm;
 And the lonely, wandering hare
 Crouches, shivering, in her form;
 While by Greenlea's frozen edge
 Hides the mallard in the sedge.
 Son, come home; the ingle-seat
 Waits thee by the glowing peat,
 And the door is off the latch.
 Come, and we will feast and sing,
 As of old at Christmas time,
 Until thou wilt drowse and nod
 And with slumber-drooping head
 Gladly seek thy bracken-bed
 Underneath the heather-thatch;
 Where the healing sleep will bring
 Unto thee the peace of God.
 Son, come home! Whom seekest thou there?

HERD: Guenevere! O Guenevere!

MOTHER: Cry no more on Guenevere.
 Some wild warlock of the fells,
 Born beneath the Devil's Scars,
 Lures thee forth to drown thy soul
 Deep in Broomlea-water cold.
 Guenevere no longer dwells
 Anywhere beneath the stars;
 Though she walked these Craggs of old,
 Many hundred years ago,
 Into earth she sank like snow;
 As a sunset-cloud in rain
 Breaks, and showers the thirsty plain,
 All the glory of her hair
 Fell to earth, we know not where.
 Leave thy foolish quest forlorn.
 Lo, to-night a King is born,
 Who, when earthly kings at last
 Into wildering night are passed,
 Yet shall wear the crown of morn.

Mary, Thou whose love may turn
 Eyes that after evil burn,
 Draw his soul, that strays so far,
 To Thy Son's white throning-star.
 Queen of Heaven, hear my prayer!

HERD: Guenevere! O Guenevere!

MOTHER: Low she lies, and may not hear.
 The white lily, Guenevere,
 Ruthless time has trodden down;
 Arthur is a tarnished crown,
 High Gawain a broken spear,
 Percival a riven shield;
 They, who taught the world to yield,
 Closed with death and lost the field,
 Stricken by the last despair:
 Launcelot is but a name
 Blown about the winds of shame;
 Surely God has quenched the flame
 That burned men's souls for Guenevere.

Mary, heed a mother's woe;
 Mary, heed a mother's tears!
 Thou, whose heart so long ago
 Knew the pangs and hopes and fears
 We poor mortal mothers know;
 Thou, to whom, on Christmas-morn,
 Christ, the Son of God, was born;
 Thou whose mother-love hath pressed
 The sweet Babe against thy breast;
 And with wondering joy hath felt
 The warm clutch of little hands,
 When the Kings from far-off lands—
 Crowned with gold, in gold attire—
 With the simple shepherds knelt
 'Mid the beasts within the byre;
 Mary, if Thy heart, afraid,
 When beyond Thy care he strayed,
 Sometimes grieved that he must grow

Unlike other boys and men—
Filled with dreams beyond Thy ken,
Anguished with diviner woe,
Pangs more fiery than Thy pain,
Deeper than Thy dark despair—
From the perils of the night
Give me back my son again.
Thou, whose love may never fail,
Heed a lonely mother's prayer!
Come in all Thy healing might!

*A sudden glory sweeps across the Fells. The vision appears in a cleft of the Crag.
The herd and his mother kneel before it.*

MOTHER: Mary, Queen of Heaven, hail!

HERD (falling forward): Guenevere! Guenevere!

THE THREE KINGS.

To C. J. S.

The Three Kings

PERSONS: KING GARLAND, KING ARLO, KING ASHALORN.

SEA-VOICES, WAVE-VOICES, AND WIND-VOICES.

SCENE: *A rock in the midst of the North Sea, whereon the three kings, bound naked by conquering
sea-rovers, have been left to perish.*

VOICE OF THE DAWN-WIND: Awaken, O sea, from thy starry dream;

Awaken, awaken!
 For delight of thy slumber not one pale gleam
 From dim star-clusters remaineth unshaken.
 All night I have haunted the valleys and rivers;
 Now hither I come—
 Ere, quickened with sunlight, the drowsy east quivers—
 To waken thy song, night-bewildered and dumb;
 To stir thy grey waters, of starlight forsaken,
 To loosen white foam in the red of the dawn.

WAVE-VOICES: The sound of thy voice
 Has broken our sleep;
 All night we have waited thee, herald of light.
 We arise, we rejoice
 At thy bidding to leap,
 And spray with our laughter the trail of the night.
 All night we have waited thee, weary of stars—
 The little star-dreams, and the sleep without song;
 The deep-brooding slumber of silence that holds
 Our melody mute in the uttermost deep.
 O Wind of the Dawn, we have waited thee long;
 The sound of thy voice
 Has broken our sleep;
 We arise, we rejoice
 At thy bidding to leap,
 With a tumult of singing, a rapture of spray,
 To scatter our joy in the path of the day.

GARLAND: Day comes at last, beyond the sea's grey rim;
 The young sun leaps in sudden might of gold.

ASHALORN: Before his fire our lives will smoulder dim;
 Like stars we shine, we fade; the tale is told,
 And all our empty splendour put to scorn;
 Fate leaves us, who were clothed in pride, forlorn,
 To perish, naked, in this lonely sea.
 But yesterday we ruled as kings of earth;
 Frail men to-day; to-morrow, who shall be?

ARLO: But yesterday my cup of life was filled

To overflowing with the wine of mirth—
The plashing joy from fruitful years distilled.

GARLAND: But yesterday my kingdom sprang to birth;
My fingers scarce had grasped the might new-born,
When from my clutch the glittering pomp was torn.

SEA-VOICES: They slumber, they slumber, the kings in their pride.
The beak of the Rover is dipt in the tide;
The sails of the Rover are red in the wind;
And white is the trail of the foam flung behind.
They have fallen, have fallen, the kings in their pride;
Their sea-gates are forced by the rush of the tide;
Their splendour is scattered as surf on the wind;
And red is the trail of the terror behind.

Forsaken, forlorn,
On a rock of the sea,
In anguish they bow,
And wait for the night and the darkness to be;
Oh, bright was the gold in their hair;
The sea-weed, in scorn,
Is twined in it now;
Oh, rich was their raiment and rare,
Blue, purple, and gold,
In fold upon fold;
Of glory and majesty shorn,
They are clothed with the wind of despair.

GARLAND: Lo, the live waters run to greet the day:
Even so I laughed to see the soaring light;
My life was poised like yonder curving wave
To break in such bright revel of keen spray.

ARLO: I counted not the years that took their flight,
Gold-crowned and singing; every hour I stood,
As one enchanted in an April wood,
In some new paradise of scent and flowers.
I counted not the countless, careless hours,
The days of rapture and the nights of peace.

How should I dream that such delight could pass,
 Such colour fade, such flowing numbers cease,
 My glory perish where was none to save,
 And all my strength be trodden in the grass?

ASHALORN: Oh, blest art thou who diest in thy youth;
 Oh, blest art thou who failest in thy prime;
 While yet thine eyes are full of wondering truth;
 Ere yet thy feet have found the ways of thorn.
 Too long I wandered down the vale of time,
 A lonely wind, all songless and forlorn;
 For I have found the empty heart of things,
 The secret sorrow of the summer rose,
 And all the sadness of the April green;
 I know that every happy stream that springs
 Into a sea of bitter memories flows;
 I know the curse that God has set on kings—
 The solitary splendour and the crown
 Of desolation, and the prisoning state;
 The heart that yearns beneath the robe of gold,
 The soul that starves behind the golden gate.
 I know how chance has reared our earthly thrones
 Upon a shifting wrack of whitened bones,
 Of heroes fallen in the wars of old—
 By wind upbuilded and by wind cast down.

SEA-VOICES: As foam on the edge of the waters of night,
 They flicker and fall;
 More brief than delight,
 More frail than their tears,
 They flicker and fall
 In the tide of the years;
 Awhile they may triumph, as lords of the earth,
 With feasting and mirth,
 Yet the winds and the waters shall sweep over all.

VOICE OF THE WEST WIND: O wide-shifting wonder of sapphire and gold,
 O wandering glory of emerald and white,
 From the purple and green of the moorlands I come,
 To sweep o'er thy waters with turbulent flight,

To sway thee, and swing thee abroad in my might;
 I lean to thy lips, to their white, curling foam,
 With laughter and kisses, to smite it to spray;
 To thine uttermost deep, unlitten and cold,
 I thrill thee with rapture, then wander away.

I have drunk the red wine of the heather, and swept
 Over moorland and fell, for mile upon mile.
 The little blue loughs were merry, and leapt,
 With a shaking of laughter, in dim, dreaming hollows;
 The little blue loughs were merry, and flung
 Their spray on my wings as above them I swung;
 I laughed to their laughter, and dallied awhile;
 Then left them to sink in the silence that follows.

In the forest I stirred, like the chant of thy tides,
 The song of the boughs and the branches a-swinging;
 The ashes and beeches and oak-trees were singing,
 Like the noise of thy waters when dark tempest rides.
 I swung on the crest of the pine-trees a-swaying,
 As now on thy green, flowing surges, O sea;
 I piped in my triumph, they danced to my playing;
 I left them a-murmur, to hasten to thee.

The white clouds were driven like ships through the air,
 And grey flowed the shadows o'er sea-coloured bent,
 And dark on the heathland, and dark on the wold:
 But here on thy waters, where all things grow fair,
 They shadow with purple thine emerald and gold.
 My revel unbroken, my rapture unspent,
 To thy far-shining wonder, O sea, I have come,
 To sweep o'er thy splendour with turbulent flight;
 To sway thee, and swing thee abroad in my might;
 I lean to thy lips, to their white, curling foam,
 With laughter and kisses, to smite it to spray;
 To thine uttermost deep, unlitten and cold,
 I thrill thee with rapture, then wander away.

GARLAND: There is no sadness in the world but death.
 The years that whitened o'er thy head have taken

The colour from thy life, but still in me
 The blood beats young and red; yea, still my breath
 Is full of freshness as the wind that blows
 Across the morning-fells when night has shaken
 His cooling dews among the wakening heath.
 Yea, now the wind that lashes o'er the sea
 Stings all my quivering body to keen life
 And whips the blood into my straining limbs;
 And all the youth within me springs to fire;
 I am consumed with ravening desire
 For one brief, wild, delirious hour of strife;
 I yearn for every joy that flies or swims,
 Rides on the wind or with the water flows.
 Yet I must die by patient, slow degrees,
 With hourly wasting flesh and parching blood;
 Ah God, that I might leap into the flood,
 And perish struggling in the adventurous seas!

ARLO: My mouth is filled with saltness, and I thirst
 For forest-pools that bubble in the shade,
 When loud the hot chase pants through every glade,
 And fleeing fawns from every thicket burst;
 Or clear wine vintaged when the world was young,
 Gurgling from deep-mouthed jars of coloured stone.

ASHALORN: The noonday burns my body to the bone,
 And sets a coal of fire upon my tongue,
 Between my lips, and stifles all my breath.
 Oh come, thou only joy undying, death!

WAVE-VOICES: O wind, that failing, failing, failing, dies,
 Beneath the heat of August-laden skies,
 Sinking in sleep, sinking in quiet sleep—
 Thy blue wings folded o'er our dreaming deep

We too are weary, weary in the noon;
 We too will fall in shining slumber soon—
 Foamless and still, foamless and very still,
 Unstirred, unshaken by thy restless will.

Yet there are eyes that cannot, cannot close,
 And strong souls racked by fiery, rending woes—
 Never to rest, never to gather rest
 By any stream of murmuring waters blest.

But slumber falling, falling, on us lies,
 Silent and deep, beneath noon-laden skies,
 Silent and deep, silent and very deep,
 With blue wings folded o'er our dreaming sleep.

* * * * *

VOICE OF THE EVENING WIND: I have shaken the noon
 from my wings, I arise
 To quicken the flame in the western skies—
 To blow the clouds to a streaming flame,
 Where the red sun sinks in the opal sea,
 And red as the heart of the opal glows
 His last wild gleam in the waters grey.
 O grey-green waters, curling to rose,
 The kings are glad of the dying day;
 The kings are weary; the white mists close—
 The white mists gather to cover their shame.

ASHALORN: The evening mist is dank upon my brow,
 And cold upon my lips—yea, cold as death;
 Yet, through the gloom, she gazes on me now,
 As in our early-wedded days; her breath
 Is warm once more upon my withered cheek.
 O gaunt, grey lips, that strive but may not speak;
 O cold, grey eyes, that flicker in the gloam—
 Long have we strayed; come, let us wander home!

ARLO: Like lit September woodlands, streameth down
 Her hair, beneath the circle of her crown;
 Of rarer, redder glory than the cold
 Dead metal that for ever strives to hold
 The ever-straying wonder of live gold!
 Like woodland pools, her eyes, a dreaming brown—
 Like woodland pools where autumn-splendours drown!

O red-gold tresses, shaking in the gloam,
 Unto your light, unto your shade I come!

GARLAND: Her eyes are azure as the wind-blown sea,
 With deep sea-shadowings of grey and green;
 And like an April storm her shining hair—
 Yea, all the glittering Aprils that have been,
 And all the wondering Aprils yet to be,
 Have stored their wealth of shower and sunshine there;
 Yea, all the thousand, thousand springs of earth
 New-lit and re-awakened at her birth,
 In her sweet body glow and glimmer fair.
 O wonder of sea-colours and white foam
 And April glories, to thine arms I come!

VOICE OF THE EVENING WIND: The sun is gone,
 and the last, red flame
 Has faded away in a shimmer of rose—
 A shimmer of rose that shivers to grey.
 The kings are glad of the dying day—
 The kings are weary; the white mists close,
 The white mists gather to cover their shame.

THE SONGS OF QUEEN AVERLAINE.

To M. B.

PERSONS: THE KING,
 QUEEN AVERLAINE,
 THE KNIGHT ARKELD.

I.

KING AND QUEEN.

1.

The day has come; at last my dream unfolds
 White, wondering petals with the rising sun.
 No other glade in Love's world-garden holds
 So fair a bloom from vanquished winter won.

Long, oh, so long I watched through budding hours,
 And, trembling, feared my dream would never wake;
 As, one by one, I saw star-tranced flowers
 Out on the night their dewy splendour shake.

But with the earliest gleam of dawn it stirred,
 Knowing that Love had put the dark to flight;
 And I must sing more glad than any bird
 Because the sun has filled my dream with light.

2.

Is it high noon, already, in the land?
 O Love, I dreamed that morn could never pass;
 That we might ever wander, hand in hand,
 As children in June-meadows plucking flowers,
 Through ever-waking, fresh-unfolding hours:
 Yet now we sink love-wearied in the grass;
 Yea, it is noon, high noon in all the land.

The young wind slumbers; all the little birds
 That sang about us in the fields of morn
 Are songless now; no happy flight of words
 On Love's lip hovers—Love has waxed to noon.
 Ah, God, if Love should wane to evening soon
 To perish in a sunless world, forlorn,
 And cease with the last song of weary birds!

3.

At dawn I gathered flowers of white,
To garland them for your delight.

At noon I gathered flowers of blue,
To weave them into joy for you.

At eve I gather purple flowers,
To strew above the withered hours.

4.

She knelt at eve beside the stream,
And, sighing, sang: "O waters clear,
Forsaken now of joy and fear,
I come to drown a withered dream.

"Unseen of day, I let it fall
Within the shadow of my hair.
O little dream, that bloomed so fair,
The waters hide you after all!"

5.

"Is it not dawn?" she cried, and raised her head,
"Or hath the sun, grey-shrouded, yesternight,
Gone down with Love for ever to the dead?
When Love has perished, can there yet be light?"

"Yea, it is dawn," one answered: "see the dew
Quivers a gleam, and all the east is white;
While in the willow song begins anew."
"When Love has perished, can there yet be light?"

AVERLAINE AND ARKELD.

1.

ARKELD: Oh, why did you lift your eyes to mine?
Oh, why did you lift your drooping head?

AVERLAINE: The tangled threads of the fates entwine
Our hearts that follow as children led.

ARKELD: From the utmost ends of the earth we came,
As star moves starward through wildering night.

AVERLAINE: Our souls have mingled as flame with flame,
Yea, they have mingled as light with light.

ARKELD: Ah God, ah God, that it never had been!

AVERLAINE: The Shadow, the Shadow that falls between!

ARKELD: The stars in their courses move through the sky
Unswerving, unheeding, cold and blind.

AVERLAINE: Why did you linger nor pass me by
Where the cross-roads meet in the ways that wind?

ARKELD: I saw your eyes from the dusk of your hair
Flame out with sorrow and yearning love.

AVERLAINE: And I, who wandered with grey despair,
Looking up, saw heaven in blossom above.

ARKELD: Ah God, ah God, that it never had been!

AVERLAINE: The Shadow, the Shadow that falls between!

ARKELD: May we not go as we came, alone,
Unto the ends of the earth anew?

AVERLAINE: May we draw afresh from the rose new-blown
The golden sunlight, the crystal dew?

ARKELD: Yea, love between us has bloomed as a rose
Out of the desert under our feet.

AVERLAINE: May we forget how the red heart glows,
Forget that the dew on the petals is sweet?

ARKELD: Ah God, ah God, that it never had been!

AVERLAINE: The Shadow, the Shadow that falls between!

ARKELD: Have the ages brought us together that we Might tremble, start at shadows, and cry?

AVERLAINE: Yea, it has been, and ever will be
Till Sorrow be slain or Love's self die.

ARKELD: Stronger than Sorrow is Love; and Hate,
The brother of Love, shall end our Sorrow.

AVERLAINE: The Shadow is strong with the strength of Fate,
And, slain, would rise from the grave to-morrow.

ARKELD: Ah God, ah God, that it never had been!

AVERLAINE: The Shadow, the Shadow for ever between!

2.

AVERLAINE: Yea, we must part, and tear with ruthless hands
The golden web wherein, too late, Love strove
To weave us joy and bind us heart to heart.

ARKELD: Yea, we must part, and strew on desert-sands
Petal by petal all the rose of Love,
And part for ever where the cross-ways part.

AVERLAINE: Yea, we must part, and never turn our eyes
 From strange horizons, desolate and far,
 Though Love cry ever: "Turn but once, sad heart!"

ARKELD: Yea, we must part, and under alien skies
 Must follow after some cold, gleaming star,
 And roam, as north and south winds roam, apart.

AVERLAINE: Yea, we must part, ere Love be grown too strong
 And we too helpless to resist his might;
 While each may go with pure, unshamed heart.

ARKELD: Yea, we must part; and though we do Love wrong,
 He will the more subdue us in our flight,
 And hold us each more surely his, apart.

III. QUEEN AVERLAINE.

1.

O love, I bade you go; and you have borne
 The summer with you from the valley-lands;
 The poppy-flame has perished from the corn;
 And in the chill, wan light of early morn
 The reapers come in doleful, starveling bands,
 To bind the blackened sheaves with listless hands;
 For rain has put their sowing-toil to scorn.

O Love, I bade you go; and autumn brings
 Bleak desolation; yet within my heart
 Unquenched and fierce the flame you kindled springs;
 For, echoing all day long, the courtyard rings
 As loud it rang when, rending Love apart,
 Your white horse cantered—swift and keen to start—
 Into a world of other queens and kings.

2.

I bade you go; ah, wherefore are you gone?
 How could you leave me dark and desolate,
 O Sun of Love, that for brief summer shone?
 Mine eyes are ever on the western gate,
 Half-wishing, half-foredreading your return.
 Return, O Love, return!

I cannot live without you; through the dark
 I stretch blind hands to you across the world;
 All day on unknown battle-fields I mark
 Your sword's red course, your banner blue unfurled;
 Yet never, in my day-dreams, you return.
 Return, O Love, return!

Nay, you are gone: O Love, I bade you go.
 I would not have you come again to be
 A stranger in this house of silent woe,
 Where, being all, you would be naught to me.
 Mine, mine in dreams, but lost if you return;
 Oh, nevermore return!

3.

"To-day a wandering harper came
 With outland tales of deeds of fame;
 I hearkened from the noonday bright
 Until the failing of the light,
 The while he sang of joust and fight;
 Yet never once I caught your name.

Oh, whither, whither are you gone,
 Whose name victorious ever shone
 Above all knights of other lands?
 Across what wilderness of sands?
 By what dead sea-deserted strands?
 On what far quest of Love forlorn?

I loved you when men called you Lord
Arkeld, the never-sleeping sword;
Yet now, when all your might is furled,
And you no longer crest the world,
More are you mine than when you hurled
Destruction on the embattled horde.

4.

Oh, deeper in the silent house
The silence falls;
Only the stir of bat or mouse
About the walls.

No cry, no voice in any room,
No gust of breath;
As if, within the clutch of doom,
We waited death.

5.

The King is dead;
No longer now
The cold eyes gleam
Beneath his brow.

O cold, grey eyes,
Wherein the light
Of Love at dawn
Seemed clear and bright,

No true Love burned
Your cold desire,
Which mirrored but
My own heart's fire.

6.

The King died yesterday.... Ah, no, he died
 When young Love perished long, so long ago;
 And on his throne, as marble at my side,
 Has reigned a carven image, cold as snow,
 Though all men bowed before it, crying: "King!"

Too late, too late the chains which held me fall;
 Rock-bound, I bade the victor-knight go by;
 And now, when time has loosed me from the thrall,
 I know not where he tarries, 'neath what sky
 He waits the winter's end, the dawn of spring.

7.

Spring comes no more for me: though young March blow
 To flame the larches, and from tree to tree
 The green fire leap, till all the woodlands glow—
 Though every runnel, filled to overflow,
 Bear sea-ward, loud and brown with melted snow,
 Spring comes no more for me!

Spring comes no more for me: though April light
 The flame of gorse above the peacock sea;
 Though in an interweaving mesh of white
 The seagulls hover 'neath the cliff's sheer height;
 Though, hour by hour, new joys are winged for flight,
 Spring comes no more for me!

Spring comes no more for me: though May will shake
 White flame of hawthorn over all the lea,
 Till every thick-set hedge and tangled brake
 Puts on fresh flower of beauty for her sake;
 Though all the world from winter-sleep awake,
 Spring comes no more for me!

8.

I wandered through the city till I came

Within the vast cathedral, cool and dim;
I looked upon the windows all aflame
With blazoned knights and saints and seraphim.

I looked on kings in purple, gold and blue,
On martyrs high before whom all men bow;
Until a gleam of light my footsteps drew
Before a shining seraph, on whose brow

A little flame, for ever pure and white,
Unwavering burns—the symbol of our love;
And as I knelt before him in the night,
He looked, compassionate, on me from above.

9.

I heard a harper 'neath the castle walls
Sing, for night-shelter in the house of thralls,
A song of hapless lovers; in the shade
I paused awhile, unseen of man or maid.

Taking his harp, he touched the moaning strings,
And sang of queens unloved and loveless kings;
His song shot through my fluttering heart like flame
Till, wondering, I heard him breathe your name.

Oh, then I knew how all the deathless wrong
Time wrought of old is but a harper's song;
And all the hopeless sorrow of long years
An idle tale to win a stranger's tears.

Yea, in the song of Love's immortal dead
Our love was told; with shuddering heart I fled,
And strove to pass upon my way unseen,
But song was hushed with whispers: "Lo, the Queen!"

10.

Was it for this we loved, O Time, to be
 Among Love's deathless through eternity,
 Set high on lone, divided peaks above
 The sheltered summer-valley, broad and green?
 Was it for this our joy and grief have been,
 Our barren day-dreams, dream-deserted nights—
 That valley-lovers, looking up, might see
 How vain is Love among the starry heights,
 And, loving, sigh: "How vain a thing is Love!"?

O Love, that we had found thee in the shade
 Where, all day long, the deep, leaf-hidden glade
 Hears but the moan of some forsaken dove,
 Or the clear song of happy, nameless streams;
 Where, all night long, the August moonlight gleams
 Through warm, green dusk, no longer cold and white!
 O Love, that we had found thee, unafraid,
 One summer morn, and followed thee till night,
 As unknown valley-lovers follow Love!

11.

I have grown old, awaiting spring's return,
 And, now spring comes, I stand like winter grey
 In a young world; yet warm within me burn
 The morning-fires Love kindled in youth's day.

I have grown old; the young folk look on me
 With sighs, and wonder that I once was fair,
 And whisper one another: "Is this she?
 Did summer ever light that winter hair?"

"Ah, she is old; yet, she, too, once was young:
 Yea, loved as we love even, for men tell
 How bright her beauty burned on every tongue,
 And how a knightly stranger loved her well.

"Yet Love grows old that beats so young and warm;
 His leaping fires in dust and ashes fail;

Shall we, too, wither in the winter-storm,
And wander thus one April, old and frail?"

Love grows not old, O lovers, though youth die,
And bodily beauty perish as the flower;
Though all things fail, though spring and summer fly,
Love's fire burns quenchless till the last dark hour.

12.

O valley-lovers, think you love,
Being all of joy, knows naught of sorrow?
A day, a night
Of swift delight
That fears no dread, grey-dawning morrow?

O valley-lovers, think you love
Knows only laughter, naught of weeping?
A rose-red fire
Of warm desire
For ever burning, never sleeping?

O lovers, little know ye Love.
Love is a flame that feeds on sorrow—
A lone star bright
Through endless night
That waits a never-dawning morrow.

13.

"Thus would I sing of life,
Ere I must yield my breath:
Though broken in the strife,
I sought not after death.
Though ruthless years have scourged
My soul with sorrow's brands,
And, day by day, have urged
My feet o'er desert-sands;

Yet would I rather tread
 Again the bitter trail,
 Than lie, calm-browed and pale,
 Among the loveless dead.

No pang would I forego,
 No stab of suffering,
 No agony of woe,
 If I to life might cling;
 If I might follow still,
 For evermore, afar,
 O'er barren dale and hill,
 My Love's unfading star.
 Yea, now, with failing breath,
 Thus would I sing of life:
 Though broken in the strife,
 I sought not after death.

14.

Darkness has come upon me in the end;
 Darkness has come upon me like a friend,
 Yet undesired; why comest thou, O night,
 To seal mine eyes for ever from the light?

Darkness has come upon me; yet a star
 Burns through the night and beckons me from far.
 Look up, O eyes, unfaltering, without fear;
 O morning-star of Love, the dawn is near!

THE GOLDEN HELM.

The Golden Helm

I.

Across his stripling shoulders Geoffrey felt
The knighting-sword fall lightly, and he heard
The King's voice bid him rise; and at the word
He rose, new-flushed with knighthood, swiftly grown
To sudden manhood, though, but now, he knelt
A vigil-wearied squire before the throne.
He paused one moment while the people turned
To look on him with eyes that kindled bright,
Seeing his face aglow with strange, new light;
Yet them he saw not where they watched amazed,
And, though like azure flames Queen Hild's eyes burned,
Beyond the shadow of the throne he gazed
To where, in kindred rapture, young Christine
Stood, tremulous and white, in wind-flower grace—
Beneath her thick, dark hair, her happy face
Pale-gleaming 'midst the ruddy maiden-throng;
But, following Geoffrey's eyes, the trembling Queen
Now bade the harpers rouse the air with song:
From pulsing throat and silver-throbbing string
The music soared, light-winged, and, fluttering, fell;
When, startled as one waking from a spell,
Geoffrey stepped back among the waiting knights;
While knelt another squire before the King.
In Queen Hild's eyes yet hovered stormy lights,
Beneath her glooming brows, as waters gleam
Under snow-laden skies; the summer day
For her in that brief glance had shivered grey,
Empty of light and song. She only heard
The King and knights as people of a dream;
Yet keenly Geoffrey's lightest, laughing word
Stung to the quick, and stabbed her quivering life,
Till from each shuddering wound the red joy flowed;
And, though a ruddy fire on each cheek glowed,
She felt her drained heart within her cold;
Then all at once a hot thought stirred new strife
Within her breast, and suddenly grown old
And wise in treacherous imagining,
She pressed her thin lips to a bitter smile,

And strove with laughing mask to hide the guile
That, slowly welling, through her body poured
Cold-blooded life that feels no arrowy sting
Of joy or hope, nor thrust of pity's sword.
To Christine, where she yet enraptured stood,
Hild, turning, spake kind words, and coldly praised
The new-made knight. Each word Christine amazed
Drank in with joyous heart and eager ears;
To her it seemed ne'er lived a Queen so good;
And love's swift rapture filled her eyes with tears.
For her true heart, the day-long pageant moved
Round Geoffrey's shining presence; king and knight
But shone for her with pale, reflected light.
As tranced planets circling round the sun,
About the radiant head of her beloved
The dim throngs moved until the day was done.
When lucent gold suffused the cloudless west,
And lingering thrush-notes failed in drowsy song,
She left, at last, the weary maiden-throng,
To stray alone through dew-hung garden-glades;
And all the love unsealed within her breast
Flowed out from her to light the darkest shades.
Her quivering maiden-body could not hold
The sudden welling of love's loosened flood;
Through all her limbs it gushed, and in her blood
It stormed each throbbing pulse with blissful ache;
It seemed to spray the utmost glooms with gold,
And scatter glistening dews in every brake.
While yet she moved in rapture unafraid
Among the lilies, down the Grey Nun's Walk,
She heard behind the snapping of a stalk,
And stayed transfixed, nor dared to turn her head,
But stood a solitary, trembling maid—
Forlorn and frail, with all her courage fled.
Thus Geoffrey found her as, hot-foot, he pressed
To pour about her all the glowing tide
Day-pent within his heart; the flood-gates wide,
His love swept over her, sea after sea,
Until life almost swooned within her breast,
And she seemed like to drown in ecstasy.

Yet, as the tempest sank in calm at last,
 She rose from out the foam of love, new-born—
 As Venus from the irised surf of morn—
 To such triumphant beauty, Geoffrey, thrallèd,
 Before her stood in wonder rooted fast;
 Even his love within him bowed appallèd
 In tongueless worship as he gazed on her;
 While, lily-like, the trancèd flowers among,
 She stood, love-radiant, and above her hung
 The canopy of star-enkindling night;
 Though, when again she moved with joyous stir,
 He sprang to her in love's unchallenged might.

II.

All night, beside her slumbering lord, the Queen
 Tossed sleepless—every aching sense astrain
 With tingling wakefulness that racked like pain
 Her weary limbs; all night, in wide-eyed dread,
 She watched the slow hours moving dark between
 The glimmering window and the curtained bed.
 The fitful calling of the owl, all night,
 Struck like the voice of terror on her ears;
 With brushing wings, about her taloned fears
 Fluttered till dawn: when, as the summer gloom,
 Grey-quivering, spilt in silver-showering light,
 She rose and stood within the dawning room,
 Shivering and pale—her long, unbraided hair
 Each moment quickening to a livelier gold
 About her snowy shoulders; yet, more cold
 Than the still gleam of winter-frozen meres,
 Her blue eyes shone with strange, unseeing stare,
 As though they sought to pierce some mist of fears;
 And, when she turned, the old familiar things
 Unknown and alien seemed to her sight—
 Outworn and faded in the morning light
 The rose-embroidered tapestries, and frail
 The painted Love that hung on irised wings
 Above the sleeping King. Dark-browed and pale

She looked upon her lord, and fresh despair
 With dreadful calm through all her being stole,
 And froze with icy breath the flickering soul
 That strove within her. Evil courage steeled
 Her heart once more, as, combing back her hair,
 She watched the waking world of wood and field:
 Hay-harvesters with long scythes flashing white;
 The dewy-browsing deer; the blue smoke-curl
 Above some woodland hut; a kerchiefed girl
 Driving the kine afield with loitering pace.
 But, as a youthful rider came in sight,
 She from the casement turned with darkening face,
 And looked not out again, and fiercely pressed
 Her white teeth in her quivering underlip,
 To stifle the wild cry that strove to slip
 From her strained throat; with clutching hands she sought
 To stay the throbbing tumult of her breast
 That fluttered like a bird in meshes caught.

Christine as yet in dreamless slumber lay
 Within her turret-chamber; but a bird
 Within the laurel singing softly stirred
 Her eyes to wakeful life, and from her bed
 She rose and stood within the light of day,
 White-faced and wondering, with lifted head.
 As April-butterflies, new-winged for flight,
 That poise awhile in quivering amaze,
 Ere they may dare the unknown, glittering ways
 Of perilous airs—upon the brink of morn
 She paused one moment in the showering light,
 In radiant ecstasy of youth forlorn.
 Then swift remembrance flushed her virgin snow,
 And wakened in her eyes the living fire;
 With joyous haste she drew her bright attire
 About her trembling limbs, with eager hands,
 Veiling her maiden beauty's morning glow,
 Before she looked abroad on meadowlands,
 Where Geoffrey rode at dawn. Across the blaze
 Of dandelions silvering to seed,
 She saw his white horse swing with easy speed;

He rode with head exultant in the breeze
 That lifted his brown hair. With lingering gaze
 She watched him vanish down an aisle of trees;
 Then, swiftly gathering her dark hair in braids
 Above her slender neck, she crossed the floor
 With noiseless step, unlatched the creaking door,
 And stole in trembling silence down the stair,
 Intent to reach the garden ere the maids
 Should come with chattering tongues and laughter there;
 When by her side she heard a rustling stir:
 The arras parted, and before her stood
 Queen Hild in proud, imperious womanhood,
 Looking upon her with cold, smiling eyes.
 In startled wonder Christine glanced at her.
 Then spake the Queen: "Do maids thus early rise
 To tend their household duties, or to feed
 The doves, relinquishing sleep's precious hours
 To see the morning dew upon the flowers
 And what frail blooms have perished 'neath the moon?
 To reach the Grey Nun's Walk, mayhap you speed—
 To count the stricken buds of lilies strewn
 O'ernight upon the soil by careless feet
 That wandered there so late? Yea, now I know,
 Christine, because you flush and tremble so.
 Yet look you not on me with eyes that burn;
 I would not stay you when you go to greet
 The rider of the dawn on his return.
 Think you I leave my bed at break of day—
 I, Hild the Queen—to thwart a lover's kiss?
 Think you my love of you could stoop to this,
 Though you would wed a fledgling, deedless Knight?
 Nay, shrink you not from me, turn not away;
 Because my heart has never known love's light,
 I fain would hear your happy tale of love,
 That I may prosper you and your fair youth.
 Will you not trust me?" Blind with love's glad truth,
 Christine sank down within Hild's outstretched arms.
 Speechless, awhile, with sobbing breath she strove;
 Then poured out all the tale of love's alarms,
 Raptures, despairs, and deathless ecstasies,

In one quick torrent from her brimming heart;
Then, quaking, ceased, and drew herself apart,
Dismayed that she so easily had revealed
To this white, cold-eyed Queen love's sanctities.
Yet Hild moved not, but stood, with hard lips sealed,
Until, the chiming of the turret-bell
Recalling her, she spake with far-off voice:
"I, loveless, in your innocent love rejoice.
May nothing stem its eager raptured course!
Oh, that my barren heart could love so well,
And feel the surge of love's subduing force!
Yet even I from out my dearth may give
To you, Christine. Would you that Geoffrey's name
Shall shine, unchallenged, on the lists of fame?
If you would have him win for you the crown
Of knightly immortality, and live
Triumphant on men's tongues in high renown,
Follow me now." With cold, exulting eyes
She raised the arras, opening to the light
An unknown stair-way clambering into night.
Within the caverned wall she swiftly passed.
Christine for one brief moment in surprise
Uncertain paused; then, wondering, followed fast.
The falling arras shutting out the day,
She stumbled blindly through the soaring gloom—
Enclosing dank and chilly as the tomb
Her panting life; and unto her it seemed
That ever, as she climbed, more sheer the way
Before her rose, and ever fainter gleamed
The wan, white star of light that overhead
Hovered remote. Far up the stair she heard
A silken rustling as, without a word,
Relentlessly Queen Hild before her sped
For ever up the ever-soaring steep.
But when it almost seemed that she must fall—
So loudly in her ears the pulses beat,
And each step seemed to sink beneath her feet—
She heard the shrilly grating of a key,
And saw, above her, in the unseen wall,
A dazzling square of day break suddenly.

Within the lighted doorway Queen Hild turned
To reach a helping hand, and, as she bent
To clutch the swooning maiden, well-nigh spent,
And drew her to the chamber, weak and faint,
Through her gold hair so rare a lustre burned,
It seemed to Christine that an aureoled saint
Leaned out from heaven to snatch her from the deep.
Then, dizzily, she sank upon the floor,
Dreaming that toil was over evermore,
And she secure in Love's celestial fold;
Till, waking gradually as from a sleep,
Her dark eyes opened on a blaze of gold.
She sat within a chamber hung around
With glistening tapestry, whereon a knight,
Who bore a golden helm above the fight,
For ever triumphed o'er assailing swords,
Or led the greenwood chase with horse and hound,
While far behind him lagged the dames and lords
And all the hunting train; till he, at length,
Brought low the antlered quarry on the brink
Of some deep, craggy cleft, wherefrom did shrink
The quailing hounds with lathered flanks aquake.
As Christine looked on them, her maiden-strength
Returned to her; and now, more broad awake,
She saw, within the centre of the room,
A golden table whereon glittered bright
A casket of wrought gold, and, in the light,
Queen Hild, awaiting her, with smiling lips,
And laughing words: "Is this then love's sad doom,
To perish, fainting, in light's brief eclipse
Between a curtain and a closed door?
Shall this bright casket ever hold, unsought,
The golden helm—in elfin-ages wrought
For some star-destined knight—because love's heart
Grows faint within her? Shall the world no more
Acclaim its helmèd lord?" But, with a start,
Christine arose, and swiftly forward came
With eager eyes, and stooped with fluttering breast—
Her slender, shapely hands together pressed
In tense expectancy, and all her face

With quivering light of wondering love aflame.
 The Queen bent down, and in a breathing space
 Unlocked the casket with a golden key,
 And deftly loosed a little golden pin;
 The heavy lid swung open and, within,
 To Christine's eyes revealed the golden helm.
 Then spake Queen Hild, once more: "Your love-gift see!
 Think you that any smith in all the realm
 Can beat dull metal to so fair a casque?
 In jewelled caverns of enchantment old
 This helm was wrought of magic-tempered gold
 To yieldless strength, by elfin-hammers chased,
 That toiled unwearied at their age-long task,
 And over it an unknown legend traced
 In letters of some world-forgotten tongue.
 At noon, with careful footing, down the stair
 Unto the hall the casket you must bear,
 When King and knight are gathered round the board,
 And, ere the tales be told or songs be sung,
 Acclaim your love the golden-helmed lord."
 Christine, awhile, in speechless wonderment,
 Hung o'er the glistening helm, and silence fell
 Within the arras'd chamber like a spell;
 While softly, on some distant, sunlit roof,
 The basking pigeons cooed with deep content;
 Till, far below, a sudden-clanging hoof
 Startled the morn. The women's lifted eyes
 One moment met in kindred ecstasy;
 Then Hild, with hopeless shudder, shaking free,
 With strained voice spake: "Why do you longer wait?
 Your love returns; shall he, in sad surprise,
 Find no glad face to greet him at the gate?"

III.

As some new jest was tossed from tongue to tongue,
 Light laughter rippled round the midday board,
 Beneath the bannered rafters: dame and lord
 And maid and squire with merry chattering

Sat feasting; though no motley humour wrung
 A smile from Hild, where she, beside the King,
 Watched pale and still. She saw on Geoffrey's face
 Grave wonder that he caught not anywhere
 Among the maids the dusk of Christine's hair,
 Or sunlight of her glance. His eyes, between
 The curtained doorway and her empty place,
 Kept eager, anxious vigil for Christine.
 But when, at last, the lingering meal nigh o'er,
 The waking harp-notes trembled through the hush,
 Like the light, fitful prelude of the thrush
 Ere his full song enchant the domèd elm;
 The arras parting, through the open door
 She came. Before her borne, the golden helm
 Within the dim-lit hall shone out so bright,
 That lord and dame in rustling wonder rose,
 And squire and maiden sought to gather close,
 With questioning lips, about the love-bright maid.
 Christine, unheeding, turned nor left nor right;
 With lifted head and eager step unstayed,
 She strode to Geoffrey, while he stood alone,
 Radiant with wondering love—as one who sees
 The light of high, eternal mysteries
 Illume awhile the mortal shade that moves
 From out oblivion unto night unknown,
 Hugging a little grace of joys and loves.
 Before him now she came and, kneeling, spake,
 With slow, clear-welling voice: "In ages old
 This helm was wrought from elfin-hammered gold,
 For one who, in the after-days, should be
 Supreme above his kind, as, in the brake
 Of branching fern, the solitary tree
 That crests the fell-top. Unto you I bring
 The gift of destiny, that, as the sun
 New-risen of your knighthood, newly-won,
 The wondering world may see its glory shine."
 As Christine spake, with questioning glance the King
 Turned to the Queen, who gave no answering sign.
 Then, stretching forth his arm, he cried: "Sir knight,
 I know not by what evil chance this maid

Has climbed the secret newell-stair unstayed
 And reached the casket-chamber, and has borne
 From thence the Helm of Strife, whereon the light
 Of day has never fallen, night or morn,
 For seven hundred years; but, ere you take
 The doomful gift, know this: he who shall dare
 To don the golden helm must ever fare
 Upon the edge of peril, ever ride
 Between dark-ambushed dangers, ever wake
 Unto the thunderous crash of battle-tide.
 Oh, pause before you take the fateful helm.
 Will you, so young, forego, for evermore,
 The sheltered haven-raptures of the shore,
 To strive in ceaseless tempest, till, at last,
 The fury-crested wave shall overwhelm
 Your broken life on death's dark crag upcast?"
 He ceased, and stood with eyes of hot appeal;
 An aching silence shuddered through the hall;
 None stirred nor spake, though, swaying like to fall,
 Christine, in mute, imploring agony,
 Wavered nigh death. As glittering points of steel
 Queen Hild's eyes gleamed in bitter victory.
 But all were turned to Geoffrey, where he stood
 In pillared might of manhood, very fair;
 His face a little paled beneath his hair,
 Though bright his eyes with all the light of day.
 At length he spake: "For evil or for good,
 I take the Helm of Strife; let come what may."

IV.

Dawn shivered coldly through the meadowlands;
 The ever-trembling aspens by the stream
 Quivered with chilly light and fitful gleam;
 Ruffling the heavy foliage of the plane,
 Until the leaves turned, like pale, lifted hands,
 A cold gust stirred with presage of near rain.
 Coldly the light on Geoffrey's hauberk fell;
 But yet more cold on Christine's heart there lay

The winter-clutch of grief, as, far away,
 She saw him ride, and in the stirrup rise
 And, turning, wave to her a last farewell.
 Beyond the ridge he vanished, and her eyes
 Caught the far flashing of the helm of gold
 One moment as it glanced with mocking light;
 Then naught but tossing pine-trees filled her sight.
 Yet darker gloomed the woodlands 'neath the drench
 Of pillared showers; colder and yet more cold
 Her heart had shuddered since the last, hot wrench
 Of parting overnight. Though still her mouth
 Felt the mute impress of love's sacred seal;
 Though still through all her senses seemed to steal
 The heavy fume of wound-wort that had hung
 All night about the hedgerows—parched with drouth;
 Though the first notes the missel-cock had sung,
 Ere darkness fled, resounded in her ears;
 Yet no hot tempest of tumultuous woe
 Shook her young body. As night-fallen snow
 Burdens with numb despair young April's green,
 Her sorrow lay upon her; hopes and fears
 Within her slept. As something vaguely seen
 Nor realised—since yesterday's dread noon
 Had shattered all love's triumph—life had passed
 About her like a dream by doom o'ercast.
 Long hours she sat, with silent, folded hands,
 And face that glimmered like a winter moon
 In cloudy hair. Across the rain-grey lands
 She gazed with eyes unseeing; till she heard
 A step within her chamber, and her name
 Fell dully on her ear; then like a flame
 Sharp anguish shot through every aching limb
 With keen remembrance. Suddenly she stirred,
 And, turning, looked on Hild. "Grieve you for him..."
 The Queen began; then, with a little gasp,
 Her voice failed, and she shrank before the gaze
 Of Christine's eyes, and, shrivelled by the blaze
 Of fires her hand had kindled, all her pride
 Fell shredded, and not even the gold clasp
 Of queenhood held, her naked deed to hide.

She quailed, and, turning, fled from out the room.
Soon Christine's wrath was drowned in whelming grief,
And in the fall of tears she found relief—
As brooding skies in sweet release of rain.
All day she wept, until, at length, the gloom
Of eve laid soothing hands upon her pain.
Then, once again, she rose, calm-browed, and sped
Downstairs with silent step, and reached, unstayed,
The Grey Nun's Walk, where all alone a maid
Drank in the rain-cooled air. With low-breathed words,
They whispered long together, while, o'erhead,
From rain-wet branches rang the song of birds.
The maiden often paused as in alarm;
Then, with uncertain, half-delaying pace,
She left Christine, returning in a space
With Philip, Christine's brother, a young squire,
Who strode by her with careless, swinging arm
And eager face, with keen, blue eyes afire.
Then all three stood, with whispering heads bent low,
In eager converse clustered; till, at last,
They parted, and, with high hopes beating fast,
Christine unto her turret-room returned—
Her dark eyes bright and all her face aglow,
As if some new-lit rapture in her burned.
About her little chamber swift she moved,
Until, at length, in travelling array,
She paused to rest, and all-impatient lay
Upon her snow-white bed, and watched the light
Fail from the lilied arras that she loved
Because her hand had wrought each petal white
And slender, emerald stem. The falling night
Was lit for her with many a memory
Of little things she could no longer see,
That had been with her in old, happy hours,
Before her girlish joys had taken flight
As morning dews from noon-unfolding flowers.
For her, with laggard pace the minutes trailed,
Till night seemed to eternity outdrawn.
At last, an hour before the summer-dawn,
She rose and once again, with noiseless tread,

Crept down the stair, grey-cloaked and closely veiled,
 While every shadow struck her cold with dread
 Lest, drawing back the arras, Hild should stand
 With mocking smile before her; but, unstayed,
 She reached the stair-foot, and, no more afraid,
 She sought a low and shadow-hidden door,
 Slid back the silent bolts with eager hand,
 And stepped into the garden dim once more.
 She quickly crossed a dewy-plashing lawn,
 And, passing through a little wicket-gate,
 She reached the road. Not long had she to wait
 Ere, with two bridled horses, Philip came.
 Silent they mounted; far they fared ere dawn
 Burnished the castle-weathercock to flame.

V.

Northward they climbed from out the valley mist;
 Northward they crossed the sun-enchanted fells;
 Northward they plunged down deep, fern-hidden dells;
 And northward yet—until the sapphire noon
 Had burned and glowed to thunderous amethyst
 Of evening skies about an opal moon;
 Northward they followed fast the loud-tongued fame
 Of young Sir Geoffrey of the golden helm;
 Until it seemed that storm must overwhelm
 Their weary flight. They sought a lodging-place,
 And soon upon a lonely cell they came
 Wherein a hermit laboured after grace.
 On beds of withered bracken, soft and warm,
 He housed them, and himself, all night, alone,
 Knelt in long vigil on the aching stone,
 Within his little chapel, though, all night,
 His prayers were drowned by thunders of the storm,
 And all about him flashed blue, pulsing light.
 Christine in calm, undreaming slumber lay,
 Nor stirred till, clear and glittering, the morn
 Sang through the forest; though, with roots uptorn,
 The mightiest-limbed and highest-soaring oak

Had fallen charred, with green leaves shrivelled grey.
At tinkling of the matin-bell she woke,
And soon with Philip left the woodland boughs
For barer uplands. Over tawny bent
And purpling heath they rode till day was spent;
When, down within a broad, green-dusking dale,
They sought the shelter of the holy house
Of God's White Sisters of the Virgin's Veil.
So, day by day, they ever northward pressed,
Until they left the lands of peace behind,
And rode among the border-hills, where blind
Insatiate warfare ever rages fierce;
Where night-winds ever fan a fiery crest,
And dawn's light breaks on bright, embattled spears:
A land whose barren hills are helmed with towers;
A lone, grey land of battle-wasted shires;
A land of blackened barns and empty byres;
A land of rock-bound holds and robber-hordes,
Of slumberous noons and wakeful midnight hours,
Of ambushed dark and moonlight flashing swords.
With hand on hilt and ever-kindling eyes,
Flushed face and quivering nostril, Philip rode;
But nought assailed them; every lone abode
Forsaken seemed; all empty lay the land
Beneath the empty sky; only the cries
Of plovers pierced the blue on either hand;
Until, at sudden cresting of a hill,
The clang of battle sounded on their ears,
And, far below, they saw a surge of spears
Crash on unyielding ranks; while, from the sea
Of striving steel, with deathly singing shrill,
A spray of arrows flickered fitfully.
Amazed they stood, wide-eyed, with holden breath;
When, of a sudden, flashed upon their sight
The golden helm in midmost of the fight,
Where, with high-lifted head and undismayed,
Sir Geoffrey rode, a very lord of death,
With ever-leaping, ever-crashing blade.
Christine watched long, now cold with quaking dread,
Now hot with hope as each assailant fell;

The bright sword held her gaze as by a spell;
Because love blinded her to all but love,
Unmoved she watched the foemen shudder dead,
She whose heart erst the meanest woe could move.
Then, dazed, she saw a solitary shaft,
Unloosed with certain aim from out the bow,
Strike clean through Geoffrey's hauberk, and bring low
The golden helm, while o'er him swiftly met
The tides of fight. Christine a little laughed
With rattling throat, and stood with still eyes set.
Scarce Philip dared to raise his eyes to hers
To see the terror there. No word she spake,
But leaned a little forward through the brake
That bloomed about her in a golden blaze;
Her hands were torn to bleeding by the furze,
Yet nothing could disturb that dreadful gaze.
Then, gradually, the heaving battle swerved
To northward, faltering broken, and afar
It closed again, where, round a jutting scar,
The flashing torrent of the river curved.
With eager step Christine ran down the hill,
And sped across the late-forsaken field
To where, with shattered sword and splintered shield,
Among the mounded bodies Geoffrey lay.
She loosed his helm, but deathly pale and still
His young face gleamed within the light of day.
Christine beside him knelt, as Philip sought
A draught of water from the peat-born stream;
When, in his eyes, at last, a fitful gleam
Flickered, and bending low, with straining ears,
The laboured breathing of her name she caught;
And over his dead face fell fast her tears.
Once more towards them the tide of battle swept;
Christine moved not. Young Philip on her cried,
And strove, in vain, to draw her safe aside.
A random shaft in her unshielded breast—
Though hot to stay its course her brother leapt—
Struck quivering, and she slowly sank to rest.

VI.

Queen Hild sat weaving in her garden-close,
When on her startled ear there fell the news
Of Christine's flight before the darkling dews
Had thrilled with dawn. A strand of golden thread
Slipped from her trembling fingers as she rose
And hastened to the castle with drooped head.
All morn she paced within her blinded room,
Unresting, to and fro, her white hands clenched;
All morn within her tearless eyes, unquenched,
Blue fires of anger smouldered, yet no moan
Escaped her lips. Without, in summer bloom,
The garden murmured with bliss-burdened drone
Of hover-flies and lily-charmed bees;
Sometimes a finch lit on the window-ledge,
With shrilly pipe, or, from the rose-hung hedge,
A blackbird fluted; yet she neither heard
Nor heeded aught; until, by rich degrees,
Drowsed into noon the noise of bee and bird.
Yea, even when, without her chamber, stayed
A doubtful step, and timid fingers knocked,
She answered not, but, swiftly striding, locked
Yet more secure, with angry-clicking key,
The bolted door, and the affrighted maid
Unto the waiting hall fled, fearfully.
Wearied at last, upon her bed Queen Hild
In fitful slumber sank; but evil dreams
Of battle-stricken lands and blood-red streams
Swirled through her brain. Then, suddenly, she woke,
Wide-eyed, and sat upright, with body chilled,
Though in her throat the hot air seemed to choke.
Swiftly she rose; then, binding her loosed hair,
She bathed her throbbing brows, and, cold and calm,
Downstairs she glided, while the evening-psalm
In maiden-voices quavered, faint and sweet,
And from the chapel-tower, through quivering air,
The bell's clear silver-tinkling clove the heat.
She strode into the hall where yet the King
Sat with his knights; a weary minstrel stirred

Cool, throbbing wood-notes, throated like a bird,
From his soft-stringèd lute. With scornful eyes
Hild looked on them and spake: "Can nothing sting
Your slumberous hearts from slothful peace to rise?
Must only stripling-knights and maidens ride
To battle, where, unceasing, foemen wage
War on your marches, and your wardens rage
In impotent despair with desperate swords,
While you, O King, with sheathèd arms abide?"
She paused, and, wondering, the King and lords
Looked on her mutely; then, again, she spake:
"Shall I, then, and my maidens sally forth
With battle-brands to conquer the wild north?
Yea, I will go! Who follows after me?"
As by a blow struck suddenly awake,
The King leapt up, and, like a clamorous sea,
The knights about him. Scornfully the Queen
Looked on them: "So my woman's words have roused
The hands that slumbered and the hearts that drowsed.
Make ready then for battle; ere seven days
Have passed, the dawn must light your armour's sheen,
And in the sun your pennoned lances blaze."
Her voice ceased; and a pulsing flame of light
Flashed through the hall; in crashing thunder broke
The heavy, hanging heat; the rafters woke
In echo as the rainy torrent poured;
Bright gleamed the rapid lightning; yet more bright
The war-lust kindled hot in every lord.
To clang of armour the seventh morning stirred
From slumber; restless hoof and champing bit
Aroused the garth; and day, arising, lit
A hundred lances, as, each bolt withdrawn,
The courtyard-gate swung wide with noise far-heard,
And flickering pennons rode into the dawn—
Before his knights, the King, and at his side,
Queen Hild, with ever-northward-gazing eyes;
But, ere they far had fared, in mute surprise
They stayed and all drew rein, as down the road
They saw a little band of warriors ride—
Sore travel-stained—who bore a heavy load

Upon a branch-hung litter; while before
 Came Philip, bearing a war-broken lance.
 Though King and lords looked, wondering, in a glance
 Queen Hild had read the sorrow of his face
 And pierced the leaf-hid secret—which e'er more
 A brand of fire upon her heart would trace.
 Darkness about her swirled, but, with a fierce
 Wild, conquering shudder, shaking herself free,
 Unto the light she clung, though like a sea
 It surged and eddied round her; yet so still
 She sat, none knew her steely eyes could pierce
 The leafy screen. With guilty terror chill,
 She heard the king speak—sadly riding forth:
 "Whence come you, Philip, battle-stained and slow?
 What burden bear you with such brows of woe?"
 Then Philip answered, mournfully: "I bring
 Two wanderers home from out the perilous north.
 Prepare to gaze on death's defeat, O King."
 They lowered the litter slowly to the ground;
 Back fell the branches; in the light of day,
 In calm, white sleep Christine and Geoffrey lay,
 And at their feet the baleful Helm of Strife
 Sword-cloven. Hushed stood all the knights around,
 When spake the King, alighting: "Come, O wife,
 And let us twain, with humble heads low-bowed,
 Even at the feet of love triumphant stand,
 A little while together, hand in hand."
 The Queen obeyed; but, fearfully, she shrank
 Before the eyes of death, and, quaking, cowed,
 With moaning cry, low in the dust she sank.

*** END OF THIS PROJECT GUTENBERG EBOOK THE GOLDEN HELM ***

A Word from Project Gutenberg

We will update this book if we find any errors.

This book can be found under: <https://www.gutenberg.org/ebooks/42052>

Creating the works from print editions not protected by U.S. copyright law means that no one owns a United States copyright in these works, so the Foundation (and you!) can copy and distribute it in the United States without permission and without paying copyright royalties. Special rules, set forth in the General Terms of Use part of this license, apply to copying and distributing Project Gutenberg™ electronic works to protect the Project Gutenberg™ concept and trademark. Project Gutenberg is a registered trademark, and may not be used if you charge for the eBooks, unless you receive specific permission. If you do not charge anything for copies of this eBook, complying with the rules is very easy. You may use this eBook for nearly any purpose such as creation of derivative works, reports, performances and research. They may be modified and printed and given away – you may do practically anything in the United States with eBooks not protected by U.S. copyright law. Redistribution is subject to the trademark license, especially commercial redistribution.

The Full Project Gutenberg License

Please read this before you distribute or use this work.

To protect the Project Gutenberg™ mission of promoting the free distribution of electronic works, by using or distributing this work (or any other work associated in any way with the phrase “Project Gutenberg”), you agree to comply with all the terms of the Full Project Gutenberg™ License available with this file or online at <https://www.gutenberg.org/license>.

Section 1. General Terms of Use & Redistributing Project Gutenberg™ electronic works

1.A. By reading or using any part of this Project Gutenberg™ electronic work,

you indicate that you have read, understand, agree to and accept all the terms of this license and intellectual property (trademark/copyright) agreement. If you do not agree to abide by all the terms of this agreement, you must cease using and return or destroy all copies of Project Gutenberg™ electronic works in your possession. If you paid a fee for obtaining a copy of or access to a Project Gutenberg™ electronic work and you do not agree to be bound by the terms of this agreement, you may obtain a refund from the person or entity to whom you paid the fee as set forth in paragraph 1.E.8.

1.B. “Project Gutenberg” is a registered trademark. It may only be used on or associated in any way with an electronic work by people who agree to be bound by the terms of this agreement. There are a few things that you can do with most Project Gutenberg™ electronic works even without complying with the full terms of this agreement. See paragraph 1.C below. There are a lot of things you can do with Project Gutenberg™ electronic works if you follow the terms of this agreement and help preserve free future access to Project Gutenberg™ electronic works. See paragraph 1.E below.

1.C. The Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation (“the Foundation” or PGLAF), owns a compilation copyright in the collection of Project Gutenberg™ electronic works. Nearly all the individual works in the collection are in the public domain in the United States. If an individual work is unprotected by copyright law in the United States and you are located in the United States, we do not claim a right to prevent you from copying, distributing, performing, displaying or creating derivative works based on the work as long as all references to Project Gutenberg are removed. Of course, we hope that you will support the Project Gutenberg™ mission of promoting free access to electronic works by freely sharing Project Gutenberg™ works in compliance with the terms of this agreement for keeping the Project Gutenberg™ name associated with the work. You can easily comply with the terms of this agreement by keeping this work in the same format with its attached full Project Gutenberg™ License when you share it without charge with others.

1.D. The copyright laws of the place where you are located also govern what you can do with this work. Copyright laws in most countries are in a constant state of change. If you are outside the United States, check the laws of your country in addition to the terms of this agreement before downloading, copying, displaying, performing, distributing or creating derivative works based on this work or any other Project Gutenberg™ work. The Foundation makes no representations concerning the copyright status of any work in any country outside the United States.

1.E. Unless you have removed all references to Project Gutenberg:

1.E.1. The following sentence, with active links to, or other immediate access to, the full Project Gutenberg™ License must appear prominently whenever any copy of a Project Gutenberg™ work (any work on which the phrase “Project Gutenberg” appears, or with which the phrase “Project Gutenberg” is associated) is accessed, displayed, performed, viewed, copied or distributed:

This eBook is for the use of anyone anywhere in the United States and most other parts of the world at no cost and with almost no restrictions whatsoever. You may copy it, give it away or re-use it under the terms of the Project Gutenberg License included with this eBook or online at <https://www.gutenberg.org> . If you are not located in the United States, you'll have to check the laws of the country where you are located before using this ebook.

1.E.2. If an individual Project Gutenberg™ electronic work is derived from texts not protected by U.S. copyright law (does not contain a notice indicating that it is posted with permission of the copyright holder), the work can be copied and distributed to anyone in the United States without paying any fees or charges. If you are redistributing or providing access to a work with the phrase “Project Gutenberg” associated with or appearing on the work, you must comply either with the requirements of paragraphs 1.E.1 through 1.E.7 or obtain permission for the use of the work and the Project Gutenberg™ trademark as set forth in paragraphs 1.E.8 or 1.E.9.

1.E.3. If an individual Project Gutenberg™ electronic work is posted with the permission of the copyright holder, your use and distribution must comply with both paragraphs 1.E.1 through 1.E.7 and any additional terms imposed by the copyright holder. Additional terms will be linked to the Project Gutenberg™ License for all works posted with the permission of the copyright holder found at the beginning of this work.

1.E.4. Do not unlink or detach or remove the full Project Gutenberg™ License terms from this work, or any files containing a part of this work or any other work associated with Project Gutenberg™.

1.E.5. Do not copy, display, perform, distribute or redistribute this electronic work, or any part of this electronic work, without prominently displaying the sentence set forth in paragraph 1.E.1 with active links or immediate access to the full terms of the Project Gutenberg™ License.

1.E.6. You may convert to and distribute this work in any binary, compressed, marked up, nonproprietary or proprietary form, including any word processing or hypertext form. However, if you provide access to or distribute copies of a Project Gutenberg™ work in a format other than “Plain Vanilla ASCII” or other format used in the official version posted on the official Project Gutenberg™ web site (<https://www.gutenberg.org>), you must, at no additional cost, fee or expense to the user, provide a copy, a means of exporting a copy, or a means of obtaining a copy upon request, of the work in its original “Plain Vanilla ASCII” or other form. Any alternate format must include the full Project Gutenberg™ License as specified in paragraph 1.E.1.

1.E.7. Do not charge a fee for access to, viewing, displaying, performing, copying or distributing any Project Gutenberg™ works unless you comply with paragraph 1.E.8 or 1.E.9.

1.E.8. You may charge a reasonable fee for copies of or providing access to or distributing Project Gutenberg™ electronic works provided that

- You pay a royalty fee of 20% of the gross profits you derive from the use of Project Gutenberg™ works calculated using the method you already use to calculate your applicable taxes. The fee is owed to the owner of the Project Gutenberg™ trademark, but he has agreed to donate royalties under this paragraph to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation. Royalty payments must be paid within 60 days following each date on which you prepare (or are legally required to prepare) your periodic tax returns. Royalty payments should be clearly marked as such and sent to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation at the address specified in Section 4, “Information about donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation.”
- You provide a full refund of any money paid by a user who notifies you in writing (or by e-mail) within 30 days of receipt that s/he does not agree to the terms of the full Project Gutenberg™ License. You must require such a user to return or destroy all copies of the works possessed in a physical medium and discontinue all use of and all access to other copies of Project Gutenberg™ works.
- You provide, in accordance with paragraph 1.F.3, a full refund of any money paid for a work or a replacement copy, if a defect in the electronic work is discovered and reported to you within 90 days of receipt of the work.
- You comply with all other terms of this agreement for free distribution of Project Gutenberg™ works.

1.E.9. If you wish to charge a fee or distribute a Project Gutenberg™ electronic work or group of works on different terms than are set forth in this agreement, you must obtain permission in writing from both the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation and The Project Gutenberg Trademark LLC, the owner of the Project Gutenberg™ trademark. Contact the Foundation as set forth in Section 3. below.

1.F.

1.F.1. Project Gutenberg volunteers and employees expend considerable effort to identify, do copyright research on, transcribe and proofread works not protected by U.S. copyright law in creating the Project Gutenberg™ collection. Despite these efforts, Project Gutenberg™ electronic works, and the medium on which they may be stored, may contain “Defects,” such as, but not limited to, incomplete, inaccurate or corrupt data, transcription errors, a copyright or other intellectual property infringement, a defective or damaged disk or other medium, a computer virus, or computer codes that damage or cannot be read by your equipment.

1.F.2. LIMITED WARRANTY, DISCLAIMER OF DAMAGES – Except for the “Right of Replacement or Refund” described in paragraph 1.F.3, the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation, the owner of the Project Gutenberg™ trademark, and any other party distributing a Project Gutenberg™ electronic work under this agreement, disclaim all liability to you for damages, costs and expenses, including legal fees. YOU AGREE THAT YOU HAVE NO REMEDIES FOR NEGLIGENCE, STRICT LIABILITY, BREACH OF WARRANTY OR BREACH OF CONTRACT EXCEPT THOSE PROVIDED IN PARAGRAPH 1.F.3. YOU AGREE THAT THE FOUNDATION, THE TRADEMARK OWNER, AND ANY DISTRIBUTOR UNDER THIS AGREEMENT WILL NOT BE LIABLE TO YOU FOR ACTUAL, DIRECT, INDIRECT, CONSEQUENTIAL, PUNITIVE OR INCIDENTAL DAMAGES EVEN IF YOU GIVE NOTICE OF THE POSSIBILITY OF SUCH DAMAGE.

1.F.3. LIMITED RIGHT OF REPLACEMENT OR REFUND – If you discover a defect in this electronic work within 90 days of receiving it, you can receive a refund of the money (if any) you paid for it by sending a written explanation to the person you received the work from. If you received the work on a physical medium, you must return the medium with your written explanation. The person or entity that provided you with the defective work may elect to provide a replacement copy in lieu of a refund. If you received the work electronically, the person or entity providing it to you may choose to give you a second opportunity to receive the work electronically in lieu of a refund. If the second copy is also defective, you may demand a refund in writing without further opportunities to fix the problem.

1.F.4. Except for the limited right of replacement or refund set forth in paragraph 1.F.3, this work is provided to you ‘AS-IS,’ WITH NO OTHER WARRANTIES OF ANY KIND, EXPRESS OR IMPLIED, INCLUDING BUT NOT LIMITED TO WARRANTIES OF MERCHANTABILITY OR FITNESS FOR ANY PUR-

POSE.

1.F.5. Some states do not allow disclaimers of certain implied warranties or the exclusion or limitation of certain types of damages. If any disclaimer or limitation set forth in this agreement violates the law of the state applicable to this agreement, the agreement shall be interpreted to make the maximum disclaimer or limitation permitted by the applicable state law. The invalidity or unenforceability of any provision of this agreement shall not void the remaining provisions.

1.F.6. INDEMNITY – You agree to indemnify and hold the Foundation, the trademark owner, any agent or employee of the Foundation, anyone providing copies of Project Gutenberg™ electronic works in accordance with this agreement, and any volunteers associated with the production, promotion and distribution of Project Gutenberg™ electronic works, harmless from all liability, costs and expenses, including legal fees, that arise directly or indirectly from any of the following which you do or cause to occur: (a) distribution of this or any Project Gutenberg™ work, (b) alteration, modification, or additions or deletions to any Project Gutenberg™ work, and (c) any Defect you cause.

Section 2. Information about the Mission of Project Gutenberg™

Project Gutenberg™ is synonymous with the free distribution of electronic works in formats readable by the widest variety of computers including obsolete, old, middle-aged and new computers. It exists because of the efforts of hundreds of volunteers and donations from people in all walks of life.

Volunteers and financial support to provide volunteers with the assistance they need, is critical to reaching Project Gutenberg™'s goals and ensuring that the Project Gutenberg™ collection will remain freely available for generations to come. In 2001, the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation was created to provide a secure and permanent future for Project Gutenberg™ and future generations. To learn more about the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation and how your efforts and donations can help, see Sections 3 and 4 and the Foundation web page at <https://www.pgla.org> .

Section 3. Information about the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation

The Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation is a non profit 501(c)(3) educational corporation organized under the laws of the state of Mississippi and granted tax exempt status by the Internal Revenue Service. The Foundation's EIN or federal tax identification number is 64-6221541. Contributions to the Project

Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation are tax deductible to the full extent permitted by U.S. federal laws and your state's laws.

The Foundation's principal office is in Fairbanks, Alaska, with the mailing address: PO Box 750175, Fairbanks, AK 99775, but its volunteers and employees are scattered throughout numerous locations. Its business office is located at 809 North 1500 West, Salt Lake City, UT 84116, (801) 596-1887, email business@pglaf.org. Email contact links and up to date contact information can be found at the Foundation's web site and official page at www.gutenberg.org/contact

For additional contact information:

Dr. Gregory B. Newby
Chief Executive and Director
gbnewby@pglaf.org

Section 4. Information about Donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation

Project Gutenberg™ depends upon and cannot survive without wide spread public support and donations to carry out its mission of increasing the number of public domain and licensed works that can be freely distributed in machine readable form accessible by the widest array of equipment including outdated equipment. Many small donations ($1 to $5,000) are particularly important to maintaining tax exempt status with the IRS.

The Foundation is committed to complying with the laws regulating charities and charitable donations in all 50 states of the United States. Compliance requirements are not uniform and it takes a considerable effort, much paperwork and many fees to meet and keep up with these requirements. We do not solicit donations in locations where we have not received written confirmation of compliance. To SEND DONATIONS or determine the status of compliance for any particular state visit <https://www.gutenberg.org/donate>

While we cannot and do not solicit contributions from states where we have not met the solicitation requirements, we know of no prohibition against accepting unsolicited donations from donors in such states who approach us with offers to donate.

International donations are gratefully accepted, but we cannot make any statements concerning tax treatment of donations received from outside the United States. U.S. laws alone swamp our small staff.

Please check the Project Gutenberg Web pages for current donation methods and addresses. Donations are accepted in a number of other ways including checks, online payments and credit card donations. To donate, please visit: <https://www.gutenberg.org/donate>

Section 5. General Information About Project Gutenberg™ electronic works.

Professor Michael S. Hart was the originator of the Project Gutenberg™ concept of a library of electronic works that could be freely shared with anyone. For thirty years, he produced and distributed Project Gutenberg™ eBooks with only a loose network of volunteer support.

Project Gutenberg™ eBooks are often created from several printed editions, all of which are confirmed as not protected by copyright in the U.S. unless a copyright notice is included. Thus, we do not necessarily keep eBooks in compliance with any particular paper edition.

Most people start at our Web site which has the main PG search facility:

<https://www.gutenberg.org>

This Web site includes information about Project Gutenberg™, including how to make donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation, how to help produce our new eBooks, and how to subscribe to our email newsletter to hear about new eBooks.