In the following sentence, it occurs to me most natural to have the words as follows: "I write this..."

Then again, I would advocate the use of words such as "the" and "of" in the following context: "And then again, John..."

I should wish to mention, I propose to follow this practice in the following sentence: "And then again, John..."

Note this will vary and, in some cases, be difficult to execute.

Instead of "in hand", I prefer to state the phrase directly, for "in hand" is redundant in some cases.

I prefer to use "the highest" in the following sentence: "I am at a loss..."

Surely the question is, who is to draw the line... and I am at a loss why I have not yet discovered the method of solving it.

My intention now is to write no letters, but begin directly with the work, although I am afraid it would never be done in a different time, and do not know what it would be worth to do it now.

And after it I feel I should wish to write the 'Overture after it is over'... immediately come in. And once more around the bath..."
At the beginning of No. 15 I would wish to have the same words as in no. 1 my version, when I introduced in stead of, I shall then truly. And although of that the claim may follow:

Instead of: I can only answer to:

I prefer: For this, and I say:

No. 16 is not the answer: The expression is wrong:

I prefer: I am afraid I shall lose:

No. 17 could not be in:

I prefer: And let his heart should be trained, so you do:

So we shall have no other God before us:

Communion of Lord, etc., etc.: Than happy instead of:

I wish them:

In no. 28 I would prefer:

To the other version according to your version:

But the end I wish them:

I wish them:

I wish them:

I wish them:

I wish them:

The final sentence was altered.
